Foreword by Mrs. Florence Mugasha, Commonwealth Deputy Secretary General

The Commonwealth recognises the important role of national human rights institutions in protecting and promoting human rights at the national level. Over the past 20 years, a large number of Commonwealth member countries have established such national institutions for the promotion of public awareness about human rights, and the protection of citizens' rights generally.

The Commonwealth Secretariat's first contribution towards institutional development of national institutions was the 'Best Practice' on NHRIs, developed on the Paris Principles and now accepted and used widely in the Commonwealth and elsewhere in relation to the process of establishment and operation of national human rights bodies. We have continued to attach great importance to the work of NHRIs, and we have devoted our efforts to assist in the establishment of strong and independent national institutions, and to support national institutions to effectively carry out their mandate.

There are over 60 such national and regional institutions in the Commonwealth at present, each with varying mandates, shapes and forms, often corresponding to the size, resources and perceived imperatives and priorities of a country. Some deal only with human rights issues; others combine a number of functions including oversight over the public sector and administrative decisions, community and race relations; while others have few powers beyond those of a traditional ombudsman.

This publication is the outcome of a request that emanated from a major gathering of Commonwealth national human rights institutions in London in February this year, to produce a comparative study on the various models of national human rights bodies and mechanisms. It is evident from the study that the existing national institutions vary in their mandates, structures, functions, and degree of independence.

I welcome the publication of the 'Study on Commonwealth National Human Rights Institutions'. The objective behind this work is to highlight the good practices of the various models in place. I hope that the various comparative models and experiences as brought out in this study would be found useful by governments and national institutions, and they can draw on the experiences and best practices of the more established and effective NHRIs, in their own endeavours to advance human rights at the national level.

1 Preface

The significance of national human rights institutions

The core international legal duty of States under both the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 1966 and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights 1966 is to respect and ensure to all individuals, without discrimination, their respective civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights. The framework of the international system for the protection of human rights is founded upon the twin duties of States to first adopt measures to give effect to human rights and fundamental freedoms and second, to ensure that any person whose rights or freedoms are violated is provided with an effective remedy.

The role of strong and independent domestic institutions established by States but autonomous from them, to promote and protect human rights and hold States accountable for failing to meet their international and domestic human rights obligations, is well recognised. Indeed, the Vienna Declaration of the 1993 UN World Conference on Human Rights explicitly reaffirmed the important and constructive role played by such national human rights institutions, highlighting in particular their important advisory capacity to State authorities, their critical role in challenging and investigating human rights violations and their significant contribution to the consolidation of a human rights culture through dissemination of human rights information, provision of human rights education and training programmes and general human rights awareness raising.

The Commonwealth Secretariat, Human Rights Unit

The Commonwealth Secretariat is the intergovernmental body serving the 53 member countries of the Commonwealth. The Human Rights Unit of the Commonwealth Secretariat is mandated to assist and support Commonwealth members in their efforts to better promote and protect human rights, in accordance with the Commonwealth’s fundamental values. One core function of the Unit is to draw on shared and diverse experiences from around the Commonwealth to establish, develop, consolidate and promote international human rights standards and best practice. Central to the Unit’s work is the provision of assistance to member countries establishing or seeking to strengthen national mechanisms for the promotion and protection of human rights. The production of this report, the Commonwealth Secretariat’s first comparative audit of national human rights institutions and Ombudsman Offices, constitutes a further step in the objective of securing, protecting and promoting human rights standards across the Commonwealth.
COMPARATIVE STUDY ON MANDATES OF NHRIs IN THE COMMONWEALTH

The genesis of this report

This report was envisaged by the participants of the Commonwealth Conference of National Human Rights Institutions in London in February 2007. Many of the participants found the 2006 publication National Human Rights Institutions in the Asia-Pacific Region\(^1\) of great use in assessing both their own respective institutions, and the strengths of the then-proposed Commonwealth Forum of National Human Rights Institutions (which formed the focus of the 2007 Conference). Conference participants mandated the Commonwealth Secretariat’s Human Rights Unit to conduct a further study encompassing National Human Rights Institutions (NHRIs) and Ombudsman Offices from the four major regions of Africa, the Asia Pacific, Europe and the Americas.

This report is the first Commonwealth-wide study of NHRIs. The report is comparative in two respects. First, the report allows a comparison between the normative framework under which existing NHRIs and Ombudsman Offices operate, in terms of the mandates on which they are established, the statutory powers which they are given and the actual functions which they perform in practice to fulfil their mandates: in simple terms, a comparison between what they are required or mandated to do and what they are actually doing. Second, the report provides a means by which the mandates and functions of existing NHRIs and Ombudsman Offices respectively can be compared against each other. NHRIs and Ombudsman Offices are significantly different institutions, which operate within different normative frameworks. The primary focus of this report is on NHRIs.

The international normative context

The core international standards defining the mandate, powers and functions of NHRIs are the United Nations Principles Relating to the Status of National Human Rights Institutions (the Paris Principles\(^2\)). The Paris Principles derive their authority in part from the broad consensus surrounding their adoption. The content of the Principles therefore represents the minimum standards which could be agreed without losing this broad consensus. Over time, the Paris Principles have evolved and best practice regarding the role and functions of NHRIs was set out in the 2002 Commonwealth Secretariat National Human Rights Institutions: Best Practice guidelines, as well as other publications such as the 2001 Recommendations published by Amnesty International.

This report seeks to recognise the context in which NHRIs operate and the contemporary challenges which they face, including issues related to resourcing, independence and capacity.

Purpose of the report

Whilst NHRIs across the Commonwealth share some common features, they also differ in certain significant respects. Similarly, Ombudsman Offices differ quite markedly from NHRIs, but also from each other in terms of legislative and operational mandates. This report aims to identify both commonalities and differences, examining mechanisms for their establishment, appointment and termination procedures, resource constraints, independence from government, powers of intervention, monitoring and reporting functions, accreditation and membership of regional and other networks.

\(^1\) Raoul Wallenberg Institute (Professor Brian Burdekin and Jason Naum), Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, 2006.
The 2007 Commonwealth Conference on NHRIs requested that the Commonwealth Secretariat produce a practical comparative study to assist and empower individual NHRIs and human rights practitioners so as to improve their organisational and operational methods to more fully adhere to the normative requirements set out, inter alia, in the Paris Principles. This publication is designed to assist governments, NHRIs, Ombudsman Offices, non-government organisations (NGOs), and international and regional organisations and actors to promote and entrench ever stronger and more independent national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights in countries across the Commonwealth.

Note on methodology
This study provides a comparative account of the features of these institutions and offices – both through the schedules and in the accompanying commentary and comparative analysis. The criteria set out do not however purport to be exhaustive.

To some extent the report is a narrative statement of empirical evidence (predominantly, enabling statutes) from which critical conclusions are drawn. The Human Rights Unit believes that such global comparative research has not been collated and assimilated in this way before. The report seeks to highlight, where possible, the innovative and positive aspects of the legislative or operational mandates of particular NHRIs. It avoids, however, value judgements as to the success or failure of the actual implementation of the mandates of individual NHRIs.

Author
Any opinions expressed in this report are those of the author and should not be attributed to the Commonwealth Secretariat. The Human Rights Unit would like to record here its thanks to the author, Catherine Meredith is an Associate at the Advice on Individual Rights in Europe (AIRE) Centre, London. She holds a postgraduate degree in international human rights law from the London School of Economics, and is a visiting tutor in Public Law at King’s College London. Catherine was previously a researcher with the Human Rights Unit and assisted in the Commonwealth Conference of NHRIs held in London in February 2007.

Editor
HRU was assisted in editing this publication by Jane Gordon. Jane Gordon BA (Oxon), LLM (Distinction) is a qualified human rights lawyer. In 2002 she was appointed ad hoc Specialist Adviser to the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights (JCHR) in relation to its Human Rights Commission Inquiry. She provided comparative advice to the JCHR on the duties, functions and powers of Equality Commissions and Human Rights Commissions. In 2003, Jane was appointed Human Rights Advisor to the Northern Ireland Policing Board and, together with Keir Starmer QC, has devised the framework for monitoring the compliance of the Police Service of Northern Ireland with the Human Rights Act 1998. Ms Gordon is currently a Senior Lecturer in Human Rights at Kingston University.

2 Introduction

This report consists of a comparative study of national human rights institutions (NHRIs) and Ombudsman Offices across the Commonwealth. For simplicity, the terms NHRI and Ombudsman Office will be used as generic references throughout the course of this study, although both types of institution are known by a divergent number of titles such as human rights commissions, consultative councils, ombudsmen, public defenders and protectors - the shape and form of the institution usually being contingent on the size and resources of the country.

The NHRI is a new human rights actor, which has emerged over the last 60 years and tends to vary considerably in name, size and function. However, whilst NHRIs may differ greatly in their structure and mandates, they do nevertheless tend to share a number of common features. Broadly speaking, NHRIs are institutions created by national governments, but which operate autonomously and independently. Their mandate is the promotion and protection of human rights and they seek to co-operate with international, regional and national actors to this end. In this way, NHRIs serve as a means by which international and domestic human rights standards are preserved, strengthened and promoted. NHRIs adopt divergent approaches and practices to fulfil this objective.

This study identifies the specifics of the mandates and compositions of individual NHRIs and analyses the mechanics by which such institutions protect and promote human rights at the national level. This study adopts a comparative perspective of NHRIs. A number of non-Commonwealth NHRIs are also analysed in order to broaden the parameters of the study and provide additional comparative experience.

The study also considers the protection of human rights and public administration by Ombudsman Offices of the Commonwealth in countries where no NHRI has yet been established. Like NHRIs, Ombudsman Offices are institutions created by the State, which retain independence from executive, judicial and legislative institutions. However, Ombudsman Offices are bound by a far less extensive mandate. The majority of Ombudsman Offices act as watchdogs of the exercise of public administrative powers. Only a limited number of Ombudsman Offices pursue an explicit human rights mandate.

This report begins by considering the framework for the protection of human rights at the international level. It is important to establish at the outset what we mean by human rights and how such rights are promoted and protected (if at all) in countries that have yet to ratify core international human rights instruments. Thirty-two of the 53 Commonwealth States have yet to ratify a number of core international human rights treaties. The report therefore identifies the core minimum human rights standards which all Commonwealth nations are obliged to protect, irrespective of whether they have ratified international human rights treaties or not. Against this background, the study addresses the contemporary international, regional, domestic and local challenges facing NHRIs in the fulfilment of their human rights mandates. This provides the context for the comparative analysis of NHRIs.

Secondly, the report considers the historical and political backdrop to the creation of NHRIs. The end of colonialism, the First and Second World Wars and the end of the Cold War each introduced new political, social and economic dynamics, which impacted upon the development of the international human rights framework. In some states, NHRIs were established in an attempt to entrench core human rights standards. This process is dynamic, be it in fledgling or well-established democracies. The evolutionary development of the role and function of NHRIs is also dynamic and has enhanced both the potential power and effectiveness of NHRIs in the promotion and protection of human rights. This includes developments stemming from the UN system, most significantly, the Paris Principles and the establishment of regional and sub-regional groupings of NHRIs following the 1993 World Conference on Human Rights. The Commonwealth has itself established a number of important initiatives, such as the Harare Declaration and significant conferences on NHRIs (in particular, conferences held recently in Cambridge and London). All of these initiatives have been instrumental in the creation and strengthening of NHRIs and are discussed in this report. The key criteria for the operational success of a NHRI are also set out.

The schedules contained in this report examine the mandates, powers and functions of NHRIs. They are grouped loosely according to their regional geographical location. An accompanying commentary is provided to highlight unique features of particular NHRIs and identify best practice. The same approach is adopted in relation to the analysis of Ombudsman Offices.
3 The Protection and Promotion of Human Rights

The Commonwealth is an association of 53 independent states consulting and cooperating in the common interests of their peoples and in the promotion of international understanding and world peace. The Commonwealth’s 2 billion citizens, about 30 per cent of the world’s population, are drawn from the broadest range of faiths, races, cultures and traditions.

The Commonwealth association of States spans the Americas, Europe, Africa and the Asia Pacific. Members of this association hold certain core principles in common such as a commitment to the promotion and protection of human rights.

3.1 Protection of Human Rights – a World View

The story of human rights is an evolving and dynamic one and can be traced through an endless number of debates – legal, philosophical, moral, ethical, political, social, geographical and cultural. Academics, lawyers, philosophers and many others continue to devote their time to examining what is meant by the term human rights. This study aims not to contribute to that debate, but to examine the practical mechanics by which NHRIs promote and protect human rights and defend the interests of individuals who suffer violations of their human rights. The focus here is on how NHRIs and Ombudsman Offices in the Commonwealth carry out this role. However, first it is important to define what is commonly meant by the protection and promotion of human rights.

The point has been well made by John Griffiths:

"At the heart of the controversy about "rights" lie many confusions. The most serious is to assume that the word means the same in countries with histories as different as those of the United Kingdom, the United States of America and the Republic of South Africa ... Another source of the confusion in the discussion of "rights" is creedal. There are those who believe that certain rights are inherent and inalienable, attached to the individual as part of the individual's being and inseparable therefrom. There are others... who find no meaning in this belief. [They] say that..."
rights exist only in things separate from us. [They] say also that rights in their proper sense mean claims established by the laws of the society in which we live and enforceable in the courts or our country. It follows that such legal claims may be challenged by others and that their legitimacy falls to be decided by persons appointed for this purpose.7

The latter legal interpretation of human rights has been adopted by around ten of the 28
NHRIs and Ombudsman Offices examined in this study. For ten of these institutions, human rights mean those rights articulated in international treaties and documents, enforceable in domestic courts. For another six NHRIs, human rights are those rights that have been constitutionally enshrined. Something more elemental is arguably at stake when we try to ascertain what it is that NHRIs are trying to protect in States that are not parties to international human rights instruments. We find across all states a consciousness or recognition that there are certain human values or privileges which ought to be protected. As noted, there are many moral philosophical suggestions as to the premise underpinning this consciousness, ranging from 'sad, sentimental stories'8 to 'aspirations of people no matter who or where they may be'9 Yet evidence of such consciousness is demonstrated time and again in human action and reaction. For example, campaigns by Ugandan women to criminalise defilement of young girls, protests by Tibetan monks against the destruction of sacred customs by Chinese authorities, protection of Maori land rights in New Zealand or outrage against the resort to human scavenging in India. The truth appears to be that certain inalienable human rights are championed through some variety of human rights language irrespective of country-specific conditions or legal regime.

Thus, beyond the legal instruments that set out what rights individuals are entitled to, there are many different ways of thinking about human rights10. Historically, the origins of human rights have been said to lie in religious texts such as the Bible or the Koran and have followed a trajectory through the periods of Enlightenment and Industrialisation, through the 20th century to the modern or even post-modern era.11 Correlatively, international human rights law has developed 'in an unprecedented way' since the Second World War and the Cold War 'and has become a very substantive part of international law as a whole'.12 Historical and political shifts continue to shape the evolving scope and meaning of human rights, for example the birth of economic and social rights through Socialist thinking and the development of the notion of collective rights from the cultural traditions of developing counties.13 However, more recently there is growing concern over the way in which largely political actors have exploited and maligned the human rights discourse, particularly in response to international terrorism and the demands of migration.14

The language of 'human rights' was first explicitly articulated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1948 (UDHR) following the horrors of the Second World War. The UDHR was signed on 10 December 1948 and recognises in its Preamble that the 'inherent dignity and ... the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world'. Here, the modern language of human rights was born and is reflected in a number of seminal international treaties, such as the two core UN Covenants, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR).15 Over time, international law has developed in its breadth and scope, as evidenced quantitatively in the subsequent emergence of a large body of treaties.16 Individuals became recognised as subjects of international law and became capable of invoking treaty standards in legal actions against governments.17 In certain cases, individuals can enforce their rights, for example under the First Optional Protocol to the ICCPR or through regional mechanisms such as the organs of the Council of Europe or the Inter-American System.18 However, enforcement is imperfect and certainly not universal.

It is the human rights contained in these international instruments which the Commonwealth Heads of Government committed themselves and their countries to in 1991 in Harare.19 Echoes of this language can also be found in many national bills and charters of rights, either because States have incorporated the provisions of international human rights instruments into domestic law post-ratification or because they have been influenced by them in the drafting of domestic legislation.

NHRIs are mandated to promote and protect the human rights obligations of States, whether these are defined in international treaties or in Constitutions or in other 15 Reference in this report will only be made to the most important of these including the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR), the UN Convention Against Torture (CAT), the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (CERD), the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW), the International Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) and most recently the International Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD). Of course there are now a number of regional treaties and mechanisms of human rights protection including the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights and the African Convention on Human and Peoples Rights.

domestic legislation. Professor B. Dickson maintains that 'one of the greatest contributions [NHRIs] can make to the protection of human rights is ... engaging with issues at the international level', in order to better realise them at the national level. It might be thought that this argument applies to a lesser extent to States yet to ratify international treaties. However, Amnesty International has emphasised the importance of wider acceptance of international human rights standards in its Recommendations for Effective Promotion and Protection of Human Rights Institutions. The International Coordinating Committee of National Human Rights Institutions (ICC) has echoed this position, stating that international standards encompass those found in the Paris Principles and international treaties alike. Indeed, these principles and standards prove incredibly useful tools and levers for NHRIs, particularly those NHRIs operating within States that are yet to ratify major international treaties or conventions, or which have failed to meet the international human rights obligations they have adopted.

Let us consider where these so-called standards fit within the corpus of international law? The normative regime governing NHRIs, including those standards known as the Paris Principles, constitutes 'soft law'. Soft law encompasses normative rules of law that either do not stipulate concrete rights or obligations or describe those values, guidelines, ideas and proposals that may develop into rules of international law but have not yet done so. These normative standards are important within the Commonwealth, particularly because to date a significant number of the 53 Commonwealth nations have yet to ratify major international human rights treaties.

3.2 The Framework for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights in the Commonwealth

Whilst the members of the Commonwealth are drawn from 'six continents and five oceans' a series of declarations and agreements set out the commitments and 23 A discussion of the sources of international law is beyond the scope of this study. See as a starting point Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, which provides that: (1) The Court, whose function is to decide in accordance with international law such disputes as are submitted to it, shall apply, (a) international conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognised by contesting States; (b) international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law; (c) the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations; (d) subject to the provision of Article 59, judicial decision and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as a subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law. 26 This report does not seek to cast a value judgment on the weakness of the system, but to examine in an objective way how the human rights mandate of NHRIs is and may be fulfilled. However, it is important to note that the ineffectiveness of the soft law regime applicable to NHRIs in the Commonwealth and beyond should not be considered in a vacuum. Indeed, the international legal system as a whole suffers from problems such as the absence of formal institutions, the disadvantage of vague and uncertain rules, the prevalence of state interests as opposed to those of the individual and the lack of enforcement mechanisms. This topic is a matter of some debate, but entirely beyond the scope of this study. For more information see Dixon, p.12-14.

objectives of this voluntary association. The Commonwealth nations are not bound by a single constitutional text but rather a series of agreements, which have evolved as a result of discussions at a number of Commonwealth Heads of Government Meetings (CHOGM). These declarations include those concluded in Singapore (1971) and Harare (1991) – where the express commitment to the protection and promotion of human rights as a fundamental Commonwealth value was articulated.

The Singapore Declaration of Commonwealth Principles 1971\(^{29}\) established in 1971 marked the first recognition by Commonwealth Member States that a multi-national approach to the expression of common values could promote the ideals of peace, equal rights of all and an equitable and non-discriminatory international society. Members pledged their belief in:

\begin{quote}
... the liberty of the individual under the law, in equal rights for all citizens regardless of gender, race, colour, creed or political belief, and in the individual's inalienable right to participate by means of free and democratic political processes in framing the society in which he or she lives. We therefore strive to promote in each of our countries those representative institutions and guarantees for personal freedom under the law that are our common heritage.\(^{29}\)
\end{quote}

The 'unmitigated evil' of racial discrimination, prejudice and intolerance was expressly recognised. The Principles, in common with subsequent agreements and declarations, noted the individual and collective responsibility of the Member States of the Commonwealth. They were intricately linked to the political context of the time – the end of 'colonial domination' and the open recognition of the problems of 'huge disparities in wealth' between Member States.

In common with the Singapore Declaration, the Heads of Government in Harare located the principles in the context of the challenges of that decade – debt, migration and the emergence of democracies from totalitarian regimes. However, the Harare Declaration went further, recognising the importance of 'principles of justice and human rights, including the rule of law and accountable administrations'. Thus the protection of human rights was identified as going hand-in-hand with the emergence and consolidation of democracy. South Africa provided an explicit example of this relationship.\(^{30}\) The Principles remain equally applicable today as other states make the transition to multiparty politics, for example, Uganda.\(^{31}\)

The Millbrook Commonwealth Action Programme on the Harare Declaration (1995)\(^{32}\) for the first time sought to incorporate an aspect of institutional consolidation, strengthening co-operation between States to deliver previous commitments.\(^{32}\) The tri-partite Programme included the objectives to: (a) advance Commonwealth fundamental political values; (b) promote sustainable development; and (c) facilitate consensus building. The Secretariat was requested to provide advice, training and other forms of technical assistance to governments in the promotion of the Commonwealth's fundamental political values, including assistance in capacity-building of NHRIs. A weak notion of sanctions was introduced to be used in the event of an unconstitutional overthrow of a democratically elected government (in violation of the Harare Principles). This new Programme of Action envisaged a far more institutional and consensus-driven package of commitments, which was instrumental in the creation of NHRIs.

The Harare Commonwealth Declaration 1991 both reaffirmed and extended the Commonwealth Principles drawn up in Singapore in 1971. The Members at the Harare CHOGM stated that those principles deserved ongoing recognition, including the commitment to co-operate to ensure 'international peace and order', 'the liberty of the individual under the law', 'equal rights', the opposition of 'racial oppression' and the 'urgency of economic and social developments to satisfy the basic needs and aspirations of the vast majority of the peoples of the world.' These commitments reflected those contained in the International Bill of Rights (the UDHR, the ICCPR and ICESCR). Well-established norms such as equality for women and access to education were identified. Yet beyond this, the Principles were also shaped by experience particular to the Commonwealth. For example, a commitment was given to sustainable development and poverty alleviation, to environmental protection and the combating of drug trafficking and communicable diseases.

The Coolum 2002 and Aso Rock 2003 Declarations recognised the work of civil society in promoting and consolidating this agenda. These Declarations demonstrate the commitment of Commonwealth Member States to agreeing common standards and principles of action and behaviour, as stated in the Human Rights Unit Paper presented to the London Conference in February 2007:

"Over 90 per cent of the Commonwealth Member States will fall under the category of small and/or developing countries. However, differences in size and level of development do not preclude the ability to share common values as evidenced by the near complete sharing of a system of law across the Commonwealth which facilitates the development of common standards of legal behaviour: common definitions and a common understanding of the importance of laws which are in harmony with fundamental rights and freedoms.

The institutional support offered to NHRIs in effectively carrying out their mandates was further strengthened in 2002 when the Human Rights Unit (HRU) of the Commonwealth Secretariat was granted greater autonomy as a free-standing unit. HRU creates a vital nexus between national institutions, the Commonwealth Association of States and the Office of the High Commissioner on Human Rights (OHCHR). This was formalised in a 1998 Memorandum of Understanding.

The Vienna World Conference on Human Rights of 25 June 1993 also marked an important milestone, not only in the historical development of human rights in general, but also of NHRIs. This was so in two major respects. The two central objectives of the Conference were to examine the ways and means to improve the implementation of existing human rights standards and to formulate concrete proposals for improving the effectiveness of the [UN's] activities and mechanisms in the field of human rights.

Through an ‘unprecedented degree of participation by government delegates and the international human rights community’, representatives of 171 States adopted the principle that human rights are universal, indivisible, interdependent and interrelated. This recognised the need for more formal equality between categories of rights and as a result, a new kind of global human rights scheme of action was conceptualised, which involved actors at the international, national and local level:

"The recognition of interdependence between democracy, development and human rights, for example, prepares the way for future co-operation by international organisations and national agencies in the promotion of all human rights, including the right to development."

Specifically, representatives agreed the importance of ‘strengthening and building institutions relating to human rights, strengthening of a pluralistic civil society and the protection of groups which have been rendered vulnerable’. States were urged to draw up national action plans to give these commitments effect. The final agreement of the Vienna Conference was later endorsed by the 48th session of the General Assembly and has been reaffirmed in subsequent documents.

As a result of the growing global consensus on human rights articulated at the Vienna World Conference and through the Commonwealth Declarations discussed, important human rights principles were given firm expression by States through the creation of NHRIs to promote and protect human rights. The Paris Principles and the Commonwealth Secretariat Best Practice Guidelines represent programmatic articulations adopted by national human rights institutions to make concrete this set of ideals. Whilst these principles carry declaratory (rather than legal) force, they do nevertheless fill an important gap in the corpus of international human rights law and are capable of being translated into measurable and practical outcomes. This paper now turns to consider both sets of principles in more detail.

3.3 Paris Principles

The normative framework for NHRI s rests on the United Nations Principles Relating to the Status of National Institutions (the 'Paris Principles'). The Paris Principles were adopted following negotiations at a conference convened in Paris instigated and supported by the former UN Commission on Human Rights. They set standards for, and guarantee the independence of, NHRI s. The principles were subsequently endorsed by nation states through the Commission on Human Rights (1992) and the Vienna World Conference on Human Rights (1993) and formalised in a UN General Assembly Resolution 48/134 of 20 December 1993. Whilst lacking legal force, the international consensus surrounding the principles and their subsequent endorsement at the Vienna World Conference has raised their status. Some commentators suggest that it is the minimalism of the Principles that has been a major factor of their success, since they were ‘prepared... to prevent, or at least discourage States from establishing ‘window dressing’ institutions designed to placate domestic critics or impress international donors’. The marriage of core human rights principles with a clear outline of key powers and functions make the Paris Principles a practical users guide.

The Principles focus on four general areas:

- The competence and responsibilities of NHRI s, including their mandate, legislative or constitutional enactments and primary functions;
- The composition of NHRI s and guarantees of independence, including appointment and termination mechanisms for Commissioners, criteria to ensure plurality of representation and financial autonomy;
- The operational methodology, institutional competence and working methods and practices;
- Quasi-judicial competence - role and responsibilities of those NHRI s empowered to hear, investigate and resolve individual complaints.

52 Note that the original text of the Paris Principles referred to quasi-jurisdictional competences, but was later reproduced as quasi-judicial. For further information see Lindsays and Lindholt Standard Setting, Chapter 1.
The Paris Principles identify key criteria for the establishment of NHRIs:

- A legal basis establishing the NHRI, i.e. in the Constitution or enabling legislation; Constitutional entrenchment is preferred;
- A clearly defined human rights mandate with emphasis on the national implementation of international human rights standards;
- Independence: independent from government, particularly in decision-making procedures and independent from (yet co-operative with) NGOs and civil society;
- Collegiate and representative membership – i.e. pluralist representation of civil society and vulnerable groups in the governing bodies; and
- Handling of individual complaints.\(^{54}\)

Five of the seven responsibilities of NHRIs set out in the Paris Principles relate specifically to international human rights.\(^ {55}\) It is the responsibility of NHRIs to encourage accession to or ratification of international human rights instruments and (where appropriate) their Protocols by States. They may also assist with the preparation of new international treaties.\(^ {56}\) Once a treaty has been ratified, the NHRI should encourage its incorporation or implementation into domestic law.\(^ {57}\) NHRIs also have the responsibility to ‘promote and ensure the harmonisation of national legislation, regulations and practices with the international human rights instruments to which the State is a party, and their effective implementation’:\(^ {58}\) NHRIs should contribute to State Party Reports submitted to the UN treaty bodies and regional institutions.\(^ {59}\) The important contribution of NHRIs here is to submit reports which critique the State periodic reports examined by those bodies and possibly even attend the relevant hearing to provide supplementary information to that provided by the State.\(^ {60}\) These responsibilities have been recognised and further extended by the UN treaty bodies themselves, for example the Economic, Social and Cultural Committee,\(^ {61}\) the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination\(^ {62}\) and the Committee on the Rights of the Child.\(^ {63}\)

It should be emphasised from the outset that principles such as independence and pluralism are key to the effective operation and activities of NHRIs. The Commonwealth

However, Dickson argues that at least four of the responsibilities relate to international human rights and gives examples from his work as the head of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission. From the perspective of Northern Ireland however – most human rights treaties are already in place – therefore a fifth responsibility may be added in the form of NHRIs actually urging governments to ratify treaties in the first place in States where that is not the case.

\(^{56}\) For example, the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission was instrumental in the preparation of the new UN Convention on Disability. See Dickson, PL.

Secretariat attaches particular importance to the requirement of independence in its Best Practice Guidelines:

"Independence characterises all NHRIs designed to effectively monitor good governance and human rights in Commonwealth countries. NHRIs in many states operate alongside electoral and anti-corruption commissions and similar institutions. The requirement of independence is ... fundamental..."

Independence may be guaranteed through appointment and dismissal procedures, as well as via the financial autonomy of institutions.64

Investigation of complaints of human rights violations
NHRIs vary greatly as to the scope and extent to which they deal with complaints into human rights abuse. The Paris Principles require the following:

- Quasi-judicial powers falling short of enforcement (for example, the ability to call and cross-examine witnesses, compel disclosure of documents etc.);
- Mechanisms of complaints resolution provided free of charge, including conciliation and mediation; and
- Power to refer issues to appropriate state agencies, such as the Ombudsman or Public Prosecutor.

The Principles are silent on the how readily accessible NHRIs must be to the people and the bodies they serve. Professor Burdekin has noted that this constitutes an important omission and creates an apparent accountability gap. Many NHRIs have recognised this flaw and have attempted to address the issue. This gives credibility to the argument that the Paris Principles represent a floor and not a ceiling in setting certain minimum standards for the operation of NHRIs. As such, NHRIs should not feel precluded from developing and enhancing the framework established by the Principles. This progressive approach is also evidenced with respect to enforcement powers enjoyed by some NHRIs, which are much stronger than those strictly required by the Principles in some jurisdictions (for example, the power to intervene in court proceedings, power to order compensation etc.).

Fulfilling the human rights mandate
The Paris Principles articulate two particular approaches to fulfilling the human rights mandate:

- Monitoring the human rights situation of the country; and
- Hearing individual complaints and petitions and providing remedies.

NHRIs are provided with a number of the powers and functions in the Paris Principles to assist with this mandate, including:

- Investigating alleged human rights violations – either at the instigation of an individual or instigated by the Commission itself;
- Advising the government on legislation, policy and programmes and their compatibility with the States' international (and domestic) human rights obligations.

- Conducting public inquiries;
- Promoting human rights; and
- Educating the public/awareness raising.

Significantly, States at the 1993 World Conference on Human Rights recognised 'both the rationale and requirements of the Paris Principles and that each state chooses the framework which best suits its particular needs'.65 The overarching conclusion was that NHRI's constituted could form an important bridge between human rights norms and the individuals they sought to protect. Between 1948 and 1990, a handful of national institutions had been established. Following the adoption of the Paris Principles in 1991 and their global endorsement in 1993 at the Vienna World Conference, NHRI's were recognised as crucial actors in the protection, promotion and implementation of human right standards. The number of NHRI's has increased tangentially.66

Discussions at the 4th Session of the newly formed UN Human Rights Council in Geneva in March 200767 more recently raised the profile of NHRI's in the context of the world human rights community again. As Pohjolainen has noted, "international support for the establishment and strengthening of these national institutions is currently considered as one of the most important ways to improve domestic human rights records, especially in emerging democracies and countries recovering from internal conflicts or times of extreme oppression".68

3.4 Commonwealth Secretariat Best Practice Guidelines for NHRI's

The first meeting of Commonwealth NHRI's was convened in Ottawa in 1992 to discuss the operational experiences on mandates and functions of NHRI's.69 A subsequent conference was convened in Cambridge (UK) in July 2000 where 41 representatives from Commonwealth Countries and NHRI's recognised the 'critical role in the entrenchment of the universality, interdependence, interrelatedness, and indivisibility of human rights and the maintenance of good governance'.70 The delegates of the Cambridge Conference aimed to reach a consensus on the progress of the fulfilment of human rights mandates in accordance with the Paris Principles and sought to encourage greater conceptual discourse in the new era of human rights thinking.

In March 2001, an expert group convened by the Commonwealth Secretariat and supported by senior representatives of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) and the Asia Pacific Forum (APF) developed best practice guidelines on NHRI's, building on and expanding the Paris principles. The establishment of this expert group developed out of the Conference on NHRI's held by the Commonwealth Secretariat in Cambridge in 2000. The Best Practice Guidelines are split into seven chapters, as follows:

65 Best Practice Guide p. 2.
67 See http://www.unog.ch/ for more information.
70 Best Practice for National Human Rights Institutions, 2001, Commonwealth Secretariat.
The Mode of Establishment of NHRIs: Establishment should be a national project premised on a consultative, inclusive and transparent process. The legal mode of establishment should be found in enabling legislation or preferably entrenched in the constitution of the State.

Composition of NHRIs: Members should have 'integrity, moral courage and competence and be able to exercise sound judgment and fairness'; the process of appointments is considered, as well as the mechanics and terms of appointment (and dismissal).

Mandate and Powers: Should refer to international human rights standards, as well as those in domestic law and should seek harmonisation; the legislative basis of the NHRI should confer powers to monitor government compliance, investigate and resolve complaints and work with referral agencies.

Accountability and Relationships with Other Institutions: Includes accountability to the public through the evaluation of the work of the NHRI, as well as the adoption of strategic plans to meet future goals and targets. Addresses the NHRI's relationships with parliament, the executive and the courts (highlighting the principles of independence as well as complementarity) and the international human rights treaty machinery.

Accessibility: NHRIs should reach out to the most marginalised and disadvantaged individuals in society using appropriate communication strategies (for example, in recognition that a substantial part of the population might be illiterate). NHRIs should ensure their services are widely accessible and links should be forged with NGOs and wider civil society.

Significant Issues: Consideration of the context or experience in which the NHRI operates. The NHRI's role in the protection of rights in conflict zones, poor and developing areas, and in the context of racism, environmental degradation, migrant and refugee flows, discrimination towards indigenous people or based on gender, age or disability is also discussed.

Factors Which Affect the Operation of NHRIS: discussion of technical training schemes and capacity building of democratic institutions.

The most recent Commonwealth Conference of NHRIs took place in London in February 2007. The Conference provided an opportunity for NHRIs to reflect on and exchange experiences and challenges facing them. The primary focus of the Conference was to examine and discuss mechanisms through which NHRIs could co-operate and collaborate in order to further strengthen their human rights mandates in light of the success of other regional and international groupings.

During the February Conference, the Commonwealth Secretariat agreed to undertake a review of the comparative models, structures and mandates of the NHRIs and other relevant institutions in the Commonwealth with a view to presenting that study to the Forum's first meeting in Kampala in November.71

Comparative Study on Mandates of NHRI in the Commonwealth

It was also agreed that a Forum for Commonwealth NHRI (the Forum) should be established:

"premised on the commitment to human rights values with which the Commonwealth is widely associated ... to provide a platform for joint advocacy or standard-raising, and for increased interaction between [NHRI]s and governments, civil society organisations and international bodies, including events such as CHOGM ... or meetings of the UN Human Rights Council." 72

Establishment of the Forum was agreed by the consensus of the 40 delegates, composed of 23 Commonwealth NHRI and Ombudsman Offices and partner organisations, including the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights. 73 The Concluding Statement presented by the Conference Chair, Mrs. Margaret Sekaggya (of the Ugandan Human Rights Commission) reaffirmed the need:

- for Commonwealth NHRI to respect and function in conformity with the Paris Principles; and
- to strengthen co-operation efforts between NHRI in the Commonwealth, and between NHRI and international partners such as the UNHCR to promote and protect human rights at national level. 74

The Conference mandated a Steering Committee to discuss the modalities of establishing the Forum, which met for the first time in London in May 2007. 75

The Steering Committee made six major recommendations, focusing on:

- the mandate and scope of the Forum – an informal and inclusive body of Commonwealth NHRI and national accountability mechanisms fulfilling human rights mandates;
- the operating principles of the Forum – inclusiveness, complementarity and non-duplication, and pursuance of strategic objectives;
- Objectives of the Forum – a networking group of partnerships to develop and promote compliance with the Paris Principles, share consensus-based expressions of concern or support for the better protection of human rights, and increase interaction with Commonwealth Heads of Government;
- Membership of the Forum – based on ‘inclusiveness’, but recognising the standards of the Paris Principles, Commonwealth Secretariat Best Practice Guidelines and ICC Accreditation status;
- Organisational structure of the Forum – the Human Rights Unit as ‘co-ordinator,’ with appointment of chairs; and 75 The meeting was facilitated by the Commonwealth Secretariat’s Human Rights Unit and was joined by the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, Mr. Gianni Magazzini.

3.5 National Human Rights Institutions

As already noted, there is an important nexus between the existence and operation of NHRIs and the practical fulfilment of States’ human rights obligations. This was recognised by the previous Secretary-General of the UN, Kofi Annan:

"Building strong human rights institutions at the country level is what in the long run will ensure that human rights are protected and advanced in a sustained manner. The establishment or enhancement of a national protection system in each country, reflecting international human rights norms, should therefore be a principal objective of the UN. These activities are especially important in countries emerging from conflict."

NHRIs are created by constitutional amendment or national legislation. They are official, statutory or constitutional bodies, which tend to be financed by the State, although assistance may also be offered by external donors or UN funding arrangements. The members of NHRIs are usually appointed by the State also. However, it is critical to the efficacy of NHRIs that they operate independently and autonomously from the State. This is a central requirement of the Paris Principles, and is discussed in more detail below.

Amnesty International states that ‘NHRIs can be distinguished from non-governmental organisations by their very establishment as a quasi-governmental agency occupying a unique place between the judicial and executive functions of the state, and where these exist, the elected representatives of the people.’

Thus, it is the role of NHRIs to encourage governments to ratify and implement internationally recognised standards and to influence politicians and civil servants in the law-making process and in administrative decision-making. NHRIs’ complaints mechanisms facilitate the referral or investigation of alleged human rights violations. Some NHRIs intervene in court proceedings or bring cases in their own name. NHRIs also seek to hold the State to account for failing to meet its human rights obligations. NHRIs must themselves be both accessible and accountable to the public at large. They are critical to the evolution of a human rights culture and have an important role in raising awareness of human rights through education, media and training. This affords them the credibility they need to function effectively on both the local (domestic) and international level.

The idea of national protection of human rights via national institutions dates back to discussions by the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) of the UN in 1946. NHRIs were originally conceived as ‘information groups or local human rights committees,’ which would collaborate to develop the work of the Commission on Human Rights (now the UN Council for Human Rights). NHRIs were to work proactively to monitor and implement international standards. Again, whilst the Resolutions affirmed important matters of principles, there was little evidence of real progress until the General Assembly of the UN endorsed a set of guidelines for the national institutional promotion of human rights. However, the institutional remit was limited in scope. The Resolution envisaged the promotion of human rights at national level as being carried out by arms of the state (either by government bodies or public authorities) rather than by independent institutions established and governed by domestic law. Professor Burdekin notes, however, that the Resolution did ‘represent an advance in the conceptual debate by addressing more specifically the types of promotional and advisory activities national institutions should carry out and the institutional modalities involved’. The absence of the establishment of practical enforcement mechanisms provides the reason for the piecemeal establishment of NHRIs in the subsequent decade.

It is thought that the first national human rights commission was established in France in 1947, a year after the ECOSOC Recommendation. The Commission Nationale Consultative des Droits de L’homme set an early standard, which was emulated by other national commissions. The Commission forged early links with international actors such as the UN Commission on Human Rights (also newly created) which was responsible for drafting the UDHR.

However, it was not until the 1990s that the conceptual shift towards the protection and promotion of human rights at the national level by NHRIs took serious hold. NHRIs fill a vacuum in the architecture of state institutions. This is particularly true in States where the public lack access to alternative human rights enforcement mechanisms. Such institutions attempt to incentivise state compliance with human rights obligations. Of course there were some early exceptions: notably, New Zealand (1978) and Australia (1981). Some NHRIs also evolved from Ombudsman Offices or equal opportunities commissions into institutions with a human rights mandate. However, the huge increase in NHRIs over the last 20 years has led some to describe NHRIs as the ‘norm’ or even as ‘status symbols’ demonstrating a States’ commitment to its human rights obligations. Statistically speaking, experts at Human Rights Watch have estimated that the number of national institutions grew from eight in 1990 to 45 in 2002.

94 See for example Human Rights Watch Report (2001). However, there are no official statistics for the number of national institutions, but there was an increasing trend in the creation of NHRIs during the period mentioned.
The Commonwealth Secretariat Human Rights Unit has recently stated that there are now over 60 national and regional institutions in the Commonwealth that deal with specific human rights related issues.

3.6 International, Regional and Sub-Regional Groupings of NHRIs

In addition to NHRIs that operate within the national framework, there are a number of international, regional and sub-regional groupings relevant to NHRIs. These are considered in outline below.

International

- International Coordinating Committee of National Institutions for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights (ICC): The ICC is the ‘foremost representative body of NHRIs, established for the purpose of providing a collective body and voice for NHRIs’ The ICC governs the accreditation and re-accreditation process for NHRIs as a means of ensuring the ‘international recognition and trust’ of NHRIs as ‘credible, legitimate, relevant and effective.’ NHRIs become members of the ICC when they have been assessed by the ICC and found to comply with the Paris Principles. The ICC Sub-Committee on Accreditation is mandated to review and analyse accreditation applications and to make recommendations on compliance with the Paris Principles. The ICC Sub-Committee classifies members in the following way:
  - ‘A’ – compliant with Paris Principles;
  - ‘B’ – observer status: not fully in compliance or insufficient information for a determination of compliance to be made; and
  - ‘C’ – non-compliant.

Beyond the assessment and peer monitoring function, the ICC was established as a representative body to increase networking and exchanges within the UN machinery.

- National Human Rights Institutions Forum (NHRIF): The Forum is a virtual (electronic) research and information platform and forum for the benefit of

The ICC Guidelines for Accreditation Applications for NHRIs state that: ‘NHRIs may become a member of the International Coordinating Committee of National Institutions for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights (ICC) when they are assessed by the ICC in compliance with the Paris Principles. The assessment of NHRIs is carried out in accordance with article 3(c) of the Rules of Procedure of ICC. The Sub-Committee on Accreditation (the Sub-Committee) has been mandated to consider and review applications for accreditation and to make recommendations to the ICC members with regard to the compliance of applicant institutions with the Paris Principles. Applications are received and processed by the National Institutions Unit of the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) in its capacity as the ICC Secretariat’. all NHRI's. The Danish Institute of Human Rights and the OHCHR offer support to this Forum.

In addition to the ICC and the Forum (which are permanent), a number of ad-hoc conferences and projects are run from time to time, such as those provided by Equitas or the British Council.

Regional

- Asia Pacific Forum of National Human Rights Institutions (APF): The APF was formed at the first meeting of NHRI's in the Asia Pacific Region in 1996, formalising the commitment made in the APF Larrakia Declaration. The APF is an independent, non-profit organisation with three main objectives:

  1. Strengthening the capacity of individual APF member institutions to enable them to more effectively undertake their national mandates;
  2. Assisting governments and non-governmental organisations to establish national institutions in compliance with the Paris Principles; and

The APF has 13 full members, that is, those NHRI's that are fully compliant with the Paris Principles or ICC 'A' classified, with one 'candidate' institution (Timor-Leste). The Asia Pacific is the only region without a regional inter-governmental human rights mechanism, which adds to the importance of the APF.

- The Network of African NHRI's: The Network of African NHRI's is due to replace The Coordinating Committee of African National Institutions (CCANI), The OHCHR is currently assisting African NHRI's to set up a permanent Secretariat, preferred over CCANI which convened on an ad-hoc basis. The new Network is designed to fulfil the same broad objectives and functions as the CCANI.

It is also interesting to note that many of the NHRI's in the Asia Pacific Region have and continue to face challenges arising out of armed conflict situations or terrorism. For a critical account of the way in which NHRI's face such challenges see Evans, C., Human Rights Commissions and Religious Conflict in the Asia-Pacific Region, International and Comparative Law Quarterly (ICLQ) 53.3(713).

The Meeting was organised by ECOWAS in conjunction with the African Commission on Human and People’s Rights (ACHPR). The Final Communiqué states, “The purpose of the network is to serve as a platform for strengthening the capacity of national human rights institutions and protect and promote human rights in West Africa.”

The ECOWAS Secretariat is to act as the co-ordinating office for the Network in the interim period.

• Network of National Institutions of the Americas: This network was formed in November 2000 drawing inspiration from the experiences of the APF. The OHCHR was again instrumental in the establishment of this Network. Canada is the only Commonwealth member of the network.

• The Ombudsmen of Europe: The governments of Central and Eastern Europe have been keen to establish Ombudsman Offices. A loose platform for exchange exists in the form of The Ombudsmen of Europe. These States do not form part of the Commonwealth.

3.7 Contemporary Challenges facing NHRIs

The growth of human rights institutions at national level reflects a changing global political landscape. Respect for human rights has become a recognised part of this new landscape. Current challenges facing NHRIs include:

- Globalisation and corporate responsibility;
- Changing governance arrangements;
- International terrorism and national security;
- Conflict or post-conflict states; and
- Climate change.

NHRIs also face challenges on the local level. As many of the participants of the Commonwealth Conference of NHRIs in London in 2007 observed, great efforts are being made to reconcile the potential challenge to human rights posed by local cultural traditions. Key issues include physical practices, such as corporal disfigurement (female...
COMPARATIVE STUDY ON MANDATES OF NHRI S IN THE COMMONWEALTH

genital mutilation, scarring and tattooing, mandatory abortions, corporal punishment (whipping or stoning), 'honour killings', infanticide, torture and behavioural practices, which include the sale of brides, discrimination (caste systems, human scavenging), banishment, dress codes (body covering or veils), marriage (sale of brides, child or forced marriage), forced labour, and state-sponsored deprivations (in terms of political expression or assembly or access to housing or social benefits). 111

The Commonwealth Secretariat Best Practice Guidelines express an awareness of the need for dynamism in the fulfilment of the NHRI s' human rights mandate in response to such emerging challenges, stating:

• 'NHRI s should proactively and reactively respond to new challenges as and when they arise, for instance the human rights implications of the AIDS pandemic, scientific and technological advances and privacy considerations; and

• NHRI s should 'interpret their mandates creatively to address major challenges such as the AIDS pandemic and the marginalisation and discrimination of particularly vulnerable groups'. 112

The role of NHRI s in meeting these challenges is becoming more and more widely accepted. Indeed, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child has expressly recognised the importance of the independent contribution of NHRI s to the reporting process. 113 This role fits with another core responsibility of NHRI s, which is 'to co-operate with the United Nations and any other organisation in the United Nations system, the regional institutions and the national institutions of other countries that are competent in the areas of the promotion and protection of human rights'. 114

111 As noted in many of the presentations delivered at the Commonwealth Conference on NHRI s in February 2007. See also Claude and Weston table 1 at page 40. For a detailed and comprehensive report on cultural practices in Malawi, which may be common to other States, see Report for the Malawi Human Rights Commission (led by Banda, A.) 114 Paris Principles, Competence and Responsibilities.
4. Key Criteria for NHRI

Having set out the normative framework for the establishment and operational methodology of NHRI, this section of the paper turns to consider the key criteria for the effective functioning of an NHRI.

4.1 Independence

Independence from government is a core theme of the Paris Principles and is firmly endorsed by the Commonwealth Secretariat Best Practice Guidelines. Independence is commonly guaranteed in some manner in the enabling legislation of the majority of NHRI considered in this report. The preferable method of establishing an NHRI is through incorporation in the State Constitution. However, only 11 of the 28 States examined have entrenched the legal guarantees of independence in their Constitutions. It is not possible to evaluate with certainty the true extent of the operational independence of the NHRI analysed here. The majority of the enabling legislation for the NHRI explicitly recognises their independence from government. Where features of a particular NHRI appear to threaten its independence, these are highlighted. However, it is salutary to identify a number of common factors that may threaten the independence of NHRI. These include:

- Funding arrangements or budgetary procedures determined by government;
- Method of appointment or termination of commissioners and power of presidential patronage;
- Salaries of commissioners paid by government;
- Links to government departments or ministries, particularly in operational matters;
- Referral mechanisms for NHRI, which also have the potential to undermine independence; and
- Funding arrangements made with donor agencies that may push forward a particular agenda or priority.

It is recognised that it is not possible to completely separate NHRI from the executive. However, strong and effective procedural safeguards, which govern the relationship... between the NHRI and the executive and protect the operational independence of the NHRI, are critical and must be argued for energetically.

4.2 Mandates, Functions and Powers

Protection and promotion of human rights

The Paris Principles require that NHRI have a broad mandate to protect and promote human rights. All NHRI possess this mandate, as do about 50 per cent of Ombudsman Offices examined (Papua New Guinea, Namibia and Jamaica). Notably, some NHRI focus on protection rather than the promotion (for example, Ghana), while for others the opposite is true (for example, Nigeria and Denmark). Others conceptualise the issue as one of ‘prevention’ and ‘cure’ (for example, Northern Ireland and Canada), prioritising activities which aim to curb undue numbers of complaints arising through systemic abuse (Canada).

(A) PROMOTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

- Providing advice to government, parliament and other relevant entities on any issues relating to legislative or administrative practices, or proposed legislation, policies or programmes within their jurisdiction.

- Establishing advisory committees from civil society to assist the institution in the performance of its functions.

- Educating the public concerning human rights, including preparing and disseminating information both through formal educational institutions and more widely through general public schemes; for example, workshops, training programmes and the provision of resources and fact-finding sheets.

- Preparing and delivering information and educational materials and programmes to particular ‘target groups’ – for example, police, prison officials, military, judiciary etc. Exploiting international, regional and sub-regional opportunities for training.

- Monitoring government officials, agencies and actors in the private sector in terms of their compliance with international human rights treaty observations.

- Promoting ratification of human rights treaties and their incorporation into domestic law. Advising on the development of new international human rights instruments (see work of Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission).

- Reporting function: Contributing to government reports to international treaty bodies and following up and disseminating reports by the treaty bodies.

- Media Engagement: Engaging with the press and issuing public statements to raise awareness of human rights and publicising issues of concern.

- Co-operating with the UN, relevant international agencies/NGOs and NHRI.

(B) PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

- Inspecting custodial facilities and places of detention. Ensuring the relevant powers are in place to visit detention facilities unannounced and unhindered.

- Receiving, investigating and resolving complaints.
KEY CRITERIA FOR NHRIs

- Conducting national or local public enquiries into systemic violations of human rights. This might include the power to review important laws that display qualities of discrimination.

- Powers ancillary to investigation of complaints or inquiries: Compelling the attendance of witnesses and disclosure of documents when necessary to conduct effective enquiries or investigations and taking evidence on oath or affirmation. NHRIs possess coercive powers here and criminal and punitive sanctions (for example, payment of fines or imprisonment) may be attached where witnesses fail to attend or mislead the commission. Fines and imprisonment must be proportionate and not oppressive.

- Participation in legal proceedings: a NHRI may be granted representative standing or may appear in its own right as a party (see Northern Ireland). Alternatively, NHRIs may participate as third party intervenors or in an amicus curiae capacity. Some NHRIs have strong enforcement powers as to the resolution of complaints and can make applications for high court orders for relief. Some NHRIs are able to enforce interim measures in this way but others are able to secure these in a non-judicial capacity too (see India).

Clearly defined mandate
It is preferable that, like guarantees of independence, NHRI mandates are constitutionally entrenched. This safeguards the mandate from restriction by future executive leaders.

It is critical that commissioners and staff understand the full parameters and limitations of the mandates of the NHRI as set out in the enabling legislation or charter. Many of the legislative provisions examined in this study are drafted in broad terms but lack precision. It is also vital that commissioners understand the scope and meaning of human rights and are able to draw on international human rights instruments.

Functions and powers
The enabling legislation must set out the functions and powers clearly and precisely so that commissioners can carry out the mandate of the commission effectively. This also contributes to the accountability and transparency of the institution.

4.3 Membership and Composition
In line with the full range of normative standards under which the NHRIs operate, selection, appointment and removal procedures should be set out clearly in legislation. This was the case with all NHRIs studied. The duration of appointment of commissioners and opportunities for re-appointment were also specified. The principles of plurality and representative membership should also be considered.

National Human Rights Action Plans
The 1993 World Conference, which was so instrumental to the growth of NHRIs, emphasised the merits of National Human Rights Action Plans (NHRAPs). The Conference recommended that all countries adopt an NHRAP to provide an overarching strategy for the protection and promotion of human rights. However, the 1993 World Conference recommendation has not been universally implemented. Less than 20 NHRIs have developed NHRAPs to date.117 Indeed, only a small number of the NHRIs examined in this study appear to have adopted NHRAPs: Australia, New Zealand, Malawi and South Africa, although others may have formulated overarching strategies without clearly publicising these as NHRAPs.

As part of its remit to develop and publishing best practice on the promotion and protection of human rights in the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth Secretariat’s Human Rights Unit will shortly host a meeting of experts in London. The expert panel will formulate a model framework for countries pursuing a comprehensive national plan to advance human rights, based on both international human rights standards and national priorities. The experts will be drawn from all regions of the Commonwealth, and will represent government, academia, national human rights institutions, regional organisations and civil society.
5 Schedules of Commonwealth NHRIs

The core criteria of the NHRIs included in the schedules below are categorised according to the following criteria:¹¹⁷B

- Establishment and Mandate - year of establishment, name, enabling statute, legal mandate for powers and functions, safeguards for independence, membership to regional bodies, evolution of institutes
- Competence and Responsibilities (I) - reporting, monitoring, visits to detention facilities.
- Competence and Responsibilities (II) - the process for the investigation of complaints, the inquiry procedure and associated powers, advisory capacity and awareness raising/educational function.
- Quasi-judicial functions - process for receiving and resolving complaints, power of referral to appropriate state authorities, enforcement powers and relationship with judicial institutions, power to subpoena, power to order disclosure, amicus curiae
- Composition and Organisation - appointment and dismissal of Commissioners; funding sources.
- Additional Powers - other distinctive functions, recent quantitative record, future direction

The schedules of NHRIs are split into the following regional groupings:

- Asia Pacific: Australia, New Zealand, India, Maldives, Malaysia, Sri Lanka and Fiji.¹¹⁸

¹¹⁷B Note that the methodology has been, as far as possible, to: a) categorise and keep separate the specifics of the mandates as distinct units. However, it is recognised that there may be a degree of overlap and variation in practice; and b) keep the criteria as uniform as possible as between the schedules categorised as to geographical location.

¹¹⁸ Note that at the time of writing Fiji is currently suspended from the Commonwealth association of nations following the military overthrow of the democratically elected government (8 December 2006). See http://www.thecommonwealth.org/yearbook/HomeInternal/138478/ and http://www.thecommonwealth.org/news/34580/337590/fijimilitary_regime_suspended_from_commonwealth_c.htm. However, the Fiji Human Rights Commission continues to be extremely active in the protection and promotion of human rights – and in particular in its reminders to public officials that violations of human rights will not be tolerated. Therefore it is only right that the Fiji Human Rights Commission be included in this study despite the State’s current suspension.
COMPARATIVE STUDY ON MANDATES OF NHRIs IN THE COMMONWEALTH

- Africa: Zambia, Nigeria, Ghana, Uganda, Mauritius, Kenya, Malawi, South Africa and United Republic of Tanzania.\(^{119}\)
- Canada and Europe: Canada, England and Wales and Northern Ireland.\(^{120}\) Denmark is also included\(^{121}\) (this grouping is not strictly limited to Commonwealth NHRIs).
- Americas/Caribbean: A separate schedule is also included of Ombudsman Offices, which are a feature of the countries of the Americas including Papua New Guinea, Belize, Jamaica, Antigua and Barbuda, Trinidad and Tobago, Barbados and Namibia.

The schedules are followed by additional commentary discussing particular novel features of individual NHRIs and Ombudsman Offices in cases where room does not permit adequate explanation within the schedules themselves.

\(^{119}\) Note that the Cameroonian National Commission for Human Rights and Freedoms (NCHRF) is excluded on the basis that there was insufficient information for its inclusion in the study. However, the NCHRF has been taking steps to become ICC accredited and make its operations and services more accessible to the Cameroonian people. A new strategic plan was put in place following a workshop on 2-6 June 2007 in Yaoundé. See for details http://www.thecommonwealth.org/news/163087/165555/210607humanrights.htm Limited information is available in a research study carried out by the British Council on Commonwealth Human Rights Institutions, published in 2002. See http://www.britishcouncil.org/governance-commonwealth-human-rights-commissions.doc as well as Human Rights Watch Report 2001 available at http://hrw.org/reports/2001/africa/cameroon/cameroon3.html

\(^{120}\) Canada is found alongside European institutions because it does not follow the Ombudsman model as do other states in the Americas – which form an entirely separate part of the study in themselves.

\(^{121}\) Although Denmark is not a member of the Commonwealth, the Danish Institute for Human Rights (DIHR) performs an important supporting role for NHRIs in other countries (for example, Afghanistan etc.) The DIHR superseded the Danish Centre for Human Rights, which was established in 1987. The DIHR is one of the oldest NHRIs in existence and reference to DIHR would provide a good illustration in the discussion. Commentary on the NHRI Schedules

6.1 Asia Pacific

In addition to the commentary provided below, readers are referred to the report by Professor Brian Burdekin, National Human Rights Institutions in the Asia-Pacific Region, which is referenced throughout this study.

Australia

The Australian Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (HREOC) has a broad mandate encompassing human rights, equal opportunities in employment and anti-discrimination. The scope of the anti-discrimination mandate is also broad, encompassing industrial disputes, employment and minority and indigenous rights. This role coincides with the human rights mandate of the Commission in so far as it seeks to promote, protect and uphold: ‘fundamental values of fairness, equality, tolerance and non-discrimination.’ However, the organisational arrangement of the HREOC into distinct units and working groups ensures that the implementation of the human rights and anti-discrimination mandate are kept separate. The HREOC has also established anti-discrimination bodies in each of Australia’s states and territories, which play an important role in upholding the HREOC’s anti-discrimination mandate.

The HREOC engages with national and international bodies to a greater extent than the majority of NHRIs considered in this study. The HREOC works with the state and territory anti-discrimination bodies (mentioned above) as well as the Human Rights, Race, Sex, Disability and Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Social Justice Commissioners. These commissioners are appointed by federal government pursuant to The Native Title Act 1993, which mandates the Commissioners to report on human rights of indigenous people with respect to native title.

The China-Australia Human Rights Technical Co-operation Program was established in August 1997 following discussions between Premier Li Peng and Prime Minister John Howard. It represents a high level dialogue on human rights. The Technical Program activities fall into three categories: legal reform, women and children’s rights, and ethnic and minority rights. The HREOC is responsible for designing and implementing these activities through co-operative ventures with particular Chinese organisations.

146 For background information on the Programme see http://www.dfat.gov.au/hr/achrd/finta.html
COMMENTARY ON THE NHRI SCHEDULES

The HREOC also exercises a wide range of functions in relation to the international treaties and the reporting process and has held workshops to assess the government’s compliance with human rights treaties.

The HREOC has also successfully intervened in legal proceedings and acted as amicus curiae on a number of occasions. It has a mandate to intervene, with the leave of the Court, in proceedings that involve issues of race, sex and disability discrimination, human rights issues and equal opportunity in employment. This mandate is not derived solely from the Commission’s enabling Act but from a number of pieces of legislation, which makes the scheme precise and robust. The interventions concern aspects of race and disability discrimination, native title, human rights, criminal, family and refugee law.147

Fiji

The Fiji Human Rights Commission operates as a hybrid human rights and equality institution. Under Part II of the Human Rights Commission Act 1999 (HRC Act 1999), the Commission is given a significant number of powers and duties in relation to the promotion and protection of human rights which reflect the Paris Principles. Part III of the HRC Act 1999 places duties on the Commission to challenge and investigate unfair discrimination and/or victimisation. Sections 25 and 26 of the Act respectively permit persons (or their representatives) to make complaints to the Commission about a ‘contravention or alleged contravention of human rights’ or ‘unfair discrimination’.

Section 6(b) of the HRC Act 1999 states that the Commission may have ‘any other function conferred on it by or under [the] Act or by or under any other written law.’ This type of ‘catch-all’ clause is fairly typical of the enabling legislative provisions of NHRI s. It permits NHRI s to develop and interpret their mandates creatively in line with changing conditions and context. An extra safeguard for the autonomy of the Commission lies in the Constitutional entrenchment of provisions relating to its powers and functions (section 42(2) of the Constitution).

New Zealand

The New Zealand Human Rights Commission (NZHRC) has a broad mandate encompassing human rights, race and disability discrimination, equal employment opportunities, as well as rights arising under the Treaty of Waitangi.148 One of the unique features of the NZHRC is its five-year human rights action plan. The Commission was mandated to design and implement the human rights action plan pursuant to the Human Rights Amendment Act 2001. The current plan runs from 2005–2010. Other NHRI s should consider adopting this action plan model.

147 A list of the cases in which the HREOC has intervened and further information can be found at http://www.hreoc.gov.au/legal/submissions_court/index.html.
148 Briefly, the Treaty was signed on 6 February 1840 between the British Government and about 540 Maori rangatira (chiefs). The Treaty represents a political compact between the British and the Maori containing a broad statement of principles to found a nation state and build a government in New Zealand. There are many human rights problems and dimensions which flow from the Treaty, including questions of native title. For information on the NHHR C’s work in this area see http://www.hrc.co.nz/home/hrc/introduction/humanrightsandthetreatyofwaitangi/humanrightsandthetreatyofwaitangi.php.
COMPARATIVE STUDY ON MANDATES OF NHRI S IN THE COMMONWEALTH

The primary concerns addressed in the action plan include the following:

- Poverty and abuse of children
- Removal of barriers for disabled persons
- Abuse in detention facilities/institutional care
- Economic and social disparities for Maori
- The Treaty of Waitangi

The action plan was drawn up following review of submissions and contributions of over 5,000 individuals, groups and organisations. Important guidance was provided by the National Advisory Council, Race Relations, Children's Rights and Disability Sector Advisory Group, Government Liaison Committee and other government departments, Mental Health Commission and the Maori Language Commission or (Te Taura Whiri I Te Reo Maori). Nationwide consultations and research on public opinion on the status of human rights in New Zealand was also considered.

India

One of the most creative aspects of the National Human Rights Commission of India (NHRCI) is the conferral of the powers of a civil court. The power contained in section 13 of the Protection of Human Rights Act 1993 applies in the context of inquiries into complaints. The power has two elements. The first is the power to order discovery and production of documents, examine witnesses etc. These powers are commonly found in the mandates of other NHRI s. The second is a referral power, whereby certain criminal offences under the Indian Penal Code may be determined by the Commission and forwarded to a magistrate for hearing. Whilst the Paris Principles talk of quasi-judicial powers, section 13(5) of the Protection of Human Rights Act 1993 states that ‘Every proceeding before the Commission shall be deemed to be judicial proceeding’ in cases concerning matters under specific provisions of the Indian Penal Code. Similarly, the NHRCI is deemed to be a civil court for matters arising under the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The NHRCI is empowered to grant compensation and may direct disciplinary action against public servants responsible for violations of human rights. The 1993 Act provides that following the conclusion of an inquiry into human rights violations by public officials, the Commission may exercise its discretion to:

(a) recommend disciplinary action or proceedings be taken by the relevant government department (s18(1)); or

(b) approach the Supreme Court or High Court for necessary directions, orders or writs (s18(2)); or

(c) recommend the government department grant immediate interim relief to victims or family.

A special procedure is attached to investigations that concern members of the armed forces. The NHRCI also has the power to intervene in any proceedings involving alleged human rights violations, provided leave of the court has been granted. Such action has resulted in the setting aside of orders of the High Court and orders for retrials or new investigations.

149 http://www.hrc.co.nz/report/actionplan/Oforeword.html
The power of the NHRCI to intervene in legal proceedings and its powers to act as a civil court gives the NHRI a uniquely robust package of enforcement powers.

Maldives
The Human Rights Commission of the Maldives (HRCM) has faced a period of great transition in tandem with changes to the democratic process in the Maldives. The HRCM is a fledgling institution, therefore it is not possible at this stage to identify or accurately assess the creative features of its operational methodology. The HRCM was established by Presidential decree in 2003, but its work was subsequently halted. The HRCM was then re-established by the Human Rights Bill 2006. The HRCM became operational in November 2006, two months after the Maldives signed the ICCPR and ICESCR. In a survey conducted by HRCM, only 27 per cent of citizens could identify three human rights. Forty-two per cent could identify none. The HRCM’s first task has been to address this lack of knowledge through a human rights awareness raising and education campaign, which has included workshops, initiatives in schools, training of the judiciary and engagement with the media.

Malaysia
The Federal Constitution of Malaysia sets out fundamental liberties recognised and protected by the State. These fundamental principles are deemed to be human rights under the Human Rights Commission of Malaysia Act 1999. Section 4(4) of the Act states that regard must be had to the UDHR to the extent that it is not inconsistent with the Federal Constitution. This statutory provision grants precedence to the constitutionally protected rights (which are largely civil and political and omit a number of significant core rights such as the right to life). However, this provision also represents the first occasion in which the UDHR was mentioned in domestic legislation in Malaysia. The Commission’s work on the meaning and scope of human rights is significant in the context of parliament’s enactment of a number of statutes seeking to impose limitations on the exercise of the Constitutional guarantees.

Sri Lanka
Much of the work of the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) of Sri Lanka takes place in the context of internal armed conflict, particularly in the northern and eastern regions of the country. Whilst large-scale conflict in recent years has diminished due to the ceasefire, clashes still exist between the Sri Lankan Government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE). This has manifested itself in political assassinations, underage recruitment and intimidation. It is unsurprising therefore that almost two-thirds of the complaints received by the NHRC of Sri Lanka relate to abuse of those arrested and detained by police and the security forces, whether through torture, disappearances or unlawful arrest and detention.

There is a visible nexus between these particular problems and the specific powers, set out in the enabling legislation regarding arrest and detention. The arresting authorities are required to inform the Commission of persons arrested and detained within 48 hours, as well as informing it of the transfer or release of detainees. The Commission carries out regular inspections of prisons, police stations and other relevant detention facilities. In contrast to other NHRLs, however, this function is bolstered by penal sanctions attached to any kind of obstruction experienced by the Commission when attending to inspect a detention facility. The Commission also has significant enforcement powers in relation to court proceedings. Indeed, the Supreme Court may refer matters to the Commission for investigation or inquiry. Despite this strong mandate, the work of the Commission is hampered by the fact that there were no full-time Commissioners in place at the time of writing.\textsuperscript{151}

6.2 Africa

Zambia
The Zambian Human Right Commission clearly suffers the constraints of many other NHRIs across the region, such as limited resources and an apparent lack of independence at varying levels. The Zambian Commission works primarily through a Committee system, whereby certain of its core functions are delegated to five committees working on the following key areas:

- children's rights;
- torture;
- economic and social rights;
- civil and political rights; and
- gender equality.

The Commission enjoys fairly extensive enforcement powers; for example, it has the power to order the release of detainees and the power to punish those persons found guilty of human rights violations. A computerised complaints database is utilised in order to keep consistent and accurate records and to facilitate speedy resolution of complaints.

The effectiveness of visits to places of detention is significantly curtailed by the fact that whilst the Commission is legally mandated to act as a quasi-judicial tribunal, its powers are limited to making recommendations. A second major constraint is that unannounced prison visits are not conducted. The Commission cites limited funding and working environment as the sources of this constraint.

Human rights education and training is a priority for the Commission given the widespread misunderstandings about what human rights actually mean entitlements they create. The Commission takes a creative and progressive approach to the protection and promotion of human rights with many novel ideas as to how to respond to and educate the Zambian people and state officials about human rights.

Nigeria
The National Human Rights Commission of Nigeria (NHRCN) pursues a hybrid mandate — the promotion and protection of human rights and anti-corruption.

However, a lack of guarantees of independence and non-interference from government has led to the presentation of a draft bill to parliament proposing amendments to the Commission's initial enabling Act of 1995. The amendment bill is designed to fortify the Commission's independence, safeguard its existence through constitutional entrenchment, change its funding structure and widen and strengthen its powers and functions in relation to complaint investigation and resolution. A second proposed development is the creation of a human rights fund for the NHRCN. The fund will be able to receive contributions from government, public bodies and private entities. This creatively raises the number of stakeholders supporting the work of the NHRCN.

The NHRCN does not enjoy an overly broad mandate, but has been innovative in developing the areas of competence it does possess, predominately in education programmes and complaints management. In both respects, the NHRCN has sought to widen its accessibility to the people, in line with the Paris Principles. First, it has created six zonal offices reflecting the geo-political zones of the country. Secondly, it provides structured education and training to those who may be most in need, particularly in areas of abject poverty. Thus there is an emphasis on a grassroots approach to its activities. Third, whilst complaints must be submitted in writing to the Commission (either directly or through a zonal office), the NHRCN offers a writing service for those unable to write. This is hugely important in areas where illiteracy is widespread and in one simple step increases the accessibility of the Commission and its services. A pilot project is currently being tested to allow complaints to be lodged via the Commission’s website.

Ghana

The Commission on Human Rights and Administrative Justice (CHRAJ) pursues a hybrid human rights and anti-corruption mandate. It also operates as an Ombudsman Office too. The anti-corruption mandate permits investigation into complaints of corruption and abuses of power in accordance with Article 218 of the Constitution, as well as misappropriation of public monies by state officials. The Ombudsman Office seeks to secure administrative justice, which may include investigations into misconduct such as maladministration, tribalism or corruption. The mandate of the ombudsman office of the CHRAJ includes administrative justice or labour related cases, which formerly made up over three-quarters of the Commission’s work. The establishment of the Labour Commission has reduced this figure, so that such complaints now account for a quarter of the Commission’s work. In addition, the Commission investigates property confiscated by the military administrations of 1981-1993. The CHRAJ has been successful in investigating and making adverse findings against high profile public officials, including against the President of the Republic in 2005-6. There is some concern that the anti-corruption mandate of the CHRAJ impacts on the effectiveness of the institution’s core human rights activities.

The CHRAJ does enjoy fairly strong enforcement powers, including Article 229 of the Constitution, which provides that the Commissioner may instigate court proceedings and seek remedies from the court. Despite this, enforcement action is rarely taken. About 50 per cent of cases referred to the Commission are resolved by conciliation or mediation. The remaining cases result in recommendations. The greatest number of complaints received by the Commission relate to family maintenance. The CHRAJ has powers to apply to a family tribunal to order child maintenance pursuant to the Children’s Act. The Commission has also intervened in cases where children have been denied vital medical treatment (such as blood transfusions or open heart surgery) due to the beliefs of their parents.

Uganda

Many of the NHRIs studied were silent on the issue of their accountability to the public. The Uganda Human Rights Commission (UHRC) notes that a ‘measure of accountability to the public’ is achieved through its annual reports, which are debated in parliament.
This affords the public the opportunity to scrutinise and audit the work and achievements of the Commission. The Commission’s relationship with the executive causes some concern in relation to perception of the Commission’s independence. Autonomy is not guaranteed and there was consideration given to merging of the Commission with the Inspectorate of Government. The merger did not go ahead due to a public outcry.

The fulfilment of the Commission’s mandate to protect and promote human rights is hampered by fairly weak enforcement powers. Whilst the Commission can receive complaints about alleged human rights abuses, it is limited to making recommendations where violations are found. The Commission lacks an effective relationship with judicial institutions.

Mauritius

A significant aspect of the mandate of the National Human Rights Commission of Mauritius (NHRCM) is that the protection of human rights is shaped by definitions, which are not common to international human rights instruments. Chapter II of the Constitution protects civil and political rights with some reference to economic, social and cultural rights. The protections afforded by the Constitutional definitions are country-specific. For example, Section 11 protects freedom of conscience and freedom to practice one’s religion. An explicit link is made between religion and culture. Section 1 protects the right to life and encompasses the right to live with dignity. Poverty is identified within the Constitutional guarantees as an extreme form of indignity.

This contextual feature may impact on the Commission’s ability to carry out its mandate effectively with respect to the protection and promotion of international human rights standards. The recognised rights which safeguard liberty, the right to a fair trial and the prohibition against inhuman and degrading treatment are omitted from the list of Constitutional guarantees. Yet, the NHRCM reports that the greatest number of alleged human rights violations relate to police brutality, mistreatment in obtaining of evidence and undue delay in trials. The NHRCM is only mandated to investigate complaints about human rights defined in the Constitution. It is therefore prevented from challenging these violations. Allegations of police brutality and abuse may however be investigated by the Police Ombudsman. Where the Ombudsman has taken charge of a case, this precludes the Commission from looking at it.

As with other Commissions (for example, Uganda) the NHRCM enjoys a stronger relationship with parliament than with the courts. The Commission may act as a public administration watchdog, as it has the power to inquire into allegations of human rights abuses by state officials and government departments. The NHRC submits an annual report to the President to lay before the National Assembly. The Minister for Human Rights is required to report to the Commission on action taken to address human rights complaints and recommendations it has made. This is a unique feature that other NHRIs should consider adopting. The NHRCM recognises that this power does not guarantee that parliamentarians read the Commission’s reports. It has therefore proposed that a parliamentary select committee be created to study and implement the recommendations of the NHRC.

The Commission has published a statement on its website on its complaints process. It is a clear and accessible statement and a good example of the way in which NHRIs can bridge the gap between the State and citizen in fulfilment of the human rights mandate.
COMMENTARY ON THE NHR SCHEDULES

Kenya

The Kenyan National Commission Human Rights Act 2002 sets out a broad and flexible mandate for the Kenya Human Rights Commission (KHRC). The primary aim of the institution is to create 'a strong and vibrant human rights culture founded on equality and social justice for all.' The text of the Act reflects a clear commitment to the Paris Principles. Anti-corruption is included as part of the human rights mandate. There is no restriction on the Commission investigating government dealings, although external affairs of the State are outside the Commission's remit. The NHRC also possesses fairly robust enforcement powers. It has the power to apply to the High Court for an order in relation to those found guilty of human rights violations. The KHRC's explicit commitment to promote not only human rights but also social justice and equality is quite novel. This commitment is reflected in the provisions relating to the appointment of Commissioners, which require the National Assembly and the President to have regard to Kenya's ethnic, geographical, cultural, political, social and economic diversity and the principle of gender equality. These values are bolstered by the Commission's five-year strategic plan, which aims to increase human rights protection, dialogue, promotion (particularly the realisation of social and economic rights) and education.

The independence of the Commission may become less straightforward in the future. Currently, public servants may be seconded to the Commission (at the latter's request and under its direction) and at some point a conflict of interest may arise. The Commission must guard its independence and ensure that its work is not compromised or hindered.

Malawi

A unique feature of the Malawi Human Rights Commission (MHRC) is the involvement of the public in the nomination of candidates for the role of Commissioners. This public element of nomination promotes openness and transparency. Public involvement also tends to ensure that those selected are more representative of society and offer a wide cross-section of views. However, it is important within such a process to ensure that the public element of nomination of candidates does not threaten the independence of the Commission. The concern here is that the nomination process may become partisan and manipulated by political bargaining.

South Africa

The South African Human Rights Commission (SAHRC) was established under the Human Rights Commission Act 1994 (the 1994 Act). However, reference is also made to the Commission in the Constitution. Of particular interest is the provision for the Commission to approach parliament to alter or vary its powers and functions. Further, section 19 of the 1994 Act allows the legal operational framework of the Commission to be extended beyond its origins in 1994 Act through the enactment of regulations and guidance materials. Examples include the Complaints Amendments Regulations and the Complaints Handling Manual.

152 See website, available at: http://www.knchr.org
153 The orders are not specified in the statutory provisions, but one would assume therefore that all available domestic orders are available according to domestic law. It is not known whether the HRC can apply for orders available as remedies for judicial review as in the UK - for example, declaratory, quashing or mandatory etc. (which are not mentioned at all in the legislation) or whether this refers to orders to pay compensation to victims or order release of detainees as noted in the legislation.
155 See details on website available at http://www.malawihumanrightscommission.org/
The Commission has the power to enter and search premises and seize evidence carried out in the course of an investigation into a human rights violation. This process is carefully regulated and warrants are required in certain circumstances. Section 14 of the 1994 Act provides monetary relief for those who incur cost or suffer loss or damage in the course of the Commission’s investigations. Any such order is contingent upon the agreement of the Minister of Finance. Those persons who suffer damage as a result of the execution of an entry warrant may apply for damage to be made good. All such compensation payments are made from State funds. The Commission is under an obligation to publish its decisions in the Gazette from time to time. This strengthens the openness and transparency of the Commission.

The 1994 Act also embeds the rules of natural justice and fair trial guarantees. Indeed, section 9 of the 1994 Act largely mirrors ICCPR Article 14. The Commission is under an obligation to publish its decisions in the Gazette ‘from time to time’. This strengthens the openness and transparency of the Commission and its work.

Whilst it is not wholly uncommon for the enabling statutes of NHRIs examined in this study to provide such extensive guarantees to alleged violators of human rights, section 9 of the 1994 Act is perhaps novel to the extent to which these rights and guarantees are explicitly spelt out. The guarantees ensure that the human rights of all individuals are protected in all aspects of the Commission’s work.

At the time of publication of this study, there was insufficient information available to analyse the particular and more general features of the Commission for Human Rights and Good Governance.

6.3 Europe and Canada
Canada
The Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) has undergone significant change since 2002, in large part to overcome resource constraints and to eliminate the significant backlog of cases that had begun to fetter its effectiveness. The ‘Quantum Project’ set out this agenda for change. To increase the effectiveness of the Commission, it has adopted an operational approach which combines prevention, dispute resolution and knowledge development.

Indeed, the CHRC mandate to promote and protect human rights appears to have been conceptualised in terms of prevention and cure. The CHRC aims to target systemic abuse and discrimination. Thus, the Commission only represents persons in test cases involving allegations of systemic discrimination or human rights abuse. The Commission has also streamlined its complaints procedures. The Commission has the authority to refer complaints for mandatory conciliation, but there is also an opportunity for some case to proceed directly to a tribunal.

A Knowledge Centre has been established to raise awareness, conduct research and develop policy initiatives. Experts have taken part in international projects and consultations.

The CHRC has developed a comprehensive discrimination prevention programme, which establishes links with federally regulated employers and service providers to assist employers and services providers to raise awareness of responsibilities relating to equal opportunities, human rights compliant practices and fair and effective internal grievance procedures. These relationships are formalised through memoranda of understanding (MOUs). There are 11 MOUs in existence covering over 170,000 employees under federal jurisdiction.

Northern Ireland
The Northern Ireland Act 1998 implemented the Peace Agreement reached in 1998 between the British and Irish governments and political parties. The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission (NIHRC) was established a year later and its functions are provided for in the 1998 Act.156

The Human Rights Act 1998, which incorporated the European Convention on Human Rights into domestic law in the UK (Great Britain and Northern Ireland), provides the domestic human rights framework for the NIHRC, although it seeks in its promotion and protection mandate to implement international human right standards. Much of the NIHRC's activities are concerned with the promotion of human rights. Awareness raising campaigns are conducted according to identified need. The Commission also takes test cases (carefully selected and necessarily prioritised). The NIHRC may only grant assistance to individuals in relation to proceedings involving law or practice concerning the protection of human rights (under sections 69 and 70 of the Northern Ireland Act). Whilst resources have limited the amount of its casework, the approach has been successful and a number of cases brought by the Commission have resulted in the establishment of independent inquiries.

The Commission has the power to appear as a third party intervenor in cases raising significant human rights issues. This allows the Commission to bring international human rights standards to the attention of the court. The Commission may also bring cases in its own name.

England and Wales
The Commission for Equality and Human Rights of England and Wales (CEHR) was established in early 2007 and commenced operation in October 2007.157 At the time of writing, therefore, it is not possible to analyse or evaluate its functions, operational methodology or primary activities. However, the background to its creation and structure may be instructive for States or other parties attempting to establish NHRI's within their own jurisdiction. The Equality Act 2006 ('2006 Act'), which creates the CEHR, represents the most current and one of the most detailed legislative frameworks governing an NHRI.158

In 2001, the Labour government made clear its intention to establish a single equality commission with sole responsibility for promoting equality of opportunity and enforcing compliance with anti-discrimination law in Britain. To meet this objective, the CEHR

Leiden: Koninklijke Bill NV, 2005, chapter 8 (hereinafter 'Dickson NIHRC'). Note that the author, Professor Brice Dickson, was the first Chief Commissioner of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission. Professor Ramcharan was the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights in 2003-4.
157 Unlike the Human Rights Act (HRA) 1998, the Equality Act 2006 is expressly limited in its territorial scope to England and Wales - therefore the Commission only has jurisdiction over acts which have taken place within those borders.
merges the existing equality commissions (the Commission for Racial Equality, the Equal Opportunities Commission and the Disability Rights Commission). A human rights mandate was added under The Equality Act 2006. As such, the CEHR is a hybrid institution with the mandate to reduce inequality, eliminate discrimination, strengthen good relations between people and protect human rights.\textsuperscript{159} The appointment of the first Commissioners was made in July 2007.

The UK does not have a written or ‘codified’ constitution or any constitutionally entrenched Bill of Rights.\textsuperscript{160} However, in 1998, the Labour government enacted the Human Rights Act 1998 which entered into force in October 2000. The Act incorporated the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) into domestic law.\textsuperscript{161} Whilst the government gave legislative expression to ECHR rights, which are now enforceable in domestic courts, there was no specific monitoring body established to monitor the government’s compliance with its human rights obligations.\textsuperscript{162}

The experience of other Commonwealth NHRIs was considered in plans for the creation of the CEHR. The Joint Committee on Human Rights identified the following benefits of a single Commission:

- It brings together equality and human rights experts;
- It provides a single point of contact for information, advice and guidance for individuals, businesses and the voluntary and public sectors; and
- It promotes awareness of equality and human rights issues.

The 2006 Act provides a novel and flexible framework for the future of the Commission. The structure of the Commission’s internal arrangements and its core functions are left to the new Commissioners to determine. The effectiveness of the CEHR will depend on the strength (and imaginative use) of its enforcement powers and the development of a practical and effective human rights mandate in tandem with its more well established equality agenda.

The Joint Committee on Human Rights has some concerns regarding the independence and accountability of the CEHR and has recommended that the CEHR should be directly accountable to parliament.\textsuperscript{163} The quality of the Commissioners and their commitment to a dynamic and progressive human rights and equality agenda will inform the status and influence of this new Commission.

\textsuperscript{159} See work of CEHR [http://www.cehr.org.uk/].
\textsuperscript{160} Discussion of this is beyond the scope of this paper and there are many reasons cited for this. However, for an interesting discussion see Tomkins, A., \textit{Public Law}, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003, chapter 1.
\textsuperscript{162} For example, House of Lords declared indefinite detention without trial of foreign nationals suspected of having committed terrorist offences pursuant to the Anti Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 incompatible with Article 5 ECHR in A & Others v SSHD [2004] UKHL 56. This lead to the control order regime under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, which has been the subject of numerous challenges in the courts and at the time of writing was heard again before the Lords.
Denmark

Although Denmark is not in the Commonwealth, its national human rights institutions provide a good illustration on the subject matter of this study. The Danish Institute for Human Rights (DIHR) was established by statute in 2002. It continues the mandate vested in the Danish Centre for Human Rights in 1987, which included research, education and the implementation of national international programmes. The Institute is part of the Danish Centre for International Studies and Human Rights (DCISM), which also comprises the Danish Institute of International Studies (DIIS). Whilst the DIHR is primarily concerned with the promotion and protection of human rights, in October 2003, the Institute established a Complaints Committee for Ethnic Equal Treatment, which hears complaints relating to discrimination on the grounds of race or ethnic origin. There is no similar complaints system for alleged human rights violations.

The DIHR’s primary focus is on monitoring and research, making its promotion mandate more prominent in comparison to a number of the other NHris discussed here, which place a greater emphasis on complaints management and the protection mandate. The monitoring function of the DIHR operates on three levels:

1. Scrutinising enacted legislation and administrative provisions, as well as draft bills and proposed legislation;
2. Highlighting deficiencies relating to the implementation of legislation and regulations; and
3. Raising issues concerning specific human rights violations.

In carrying out its human rights promotion mandate, the DIHR has identified a number of effective methodologies that may be instructive for other NHris.

First, in terms of pre-legislative scrutiny, the DIHR relies on the Paris Principles which provide NHris with a mandate to make recommendations and proposals – this is wider than that afforded to courts or other machinery of the State. The Institute meets, on occasion, with the relevant parliamentary committee to discuss draft bills and their proposals providing the Institute the opportunity to elaborate its legal analysis and clarify more sophisticated legal points to non-human rights experts.

The DIHR adopts a selective approach to monitoring implementation of enacted laws to ensure that a wide range of matters raising human rights issues is reviewed. There are four major ways in which the DIHR carries out its post-legislative monitoring mandate.

i. Consultation: the DIHR has appointed a sub-committee to consult with NGOs and experts in order to gain more direct access to the views of civil society and build capacity.

ii. Media: which is used to raise the profile of the work of the Institute, although it notes that raising an issue in the press may compromise further negotiations to amend a bill or regulation.

164 DIHR website http://humanrights.dk/
iii. Large scale research projects to address specific areas of concern. The DIHR brings together different professional groups (for example, doctors, clinical psychologists, prosecutors, teachers etc.) to consider single issues. The groups meet regularly with each sector giving presentations on the issues from its particular professional perspective. The Institute collates the information and produces a report for public dissemination.

iv. Monitoring based on complaints submitted. This allows the DIHR to raise general concerns with the relevant authorities or private bodies. The Institute has also tried to forge links with legal advice clinics and pro bono groups.
Ombudsman Offices

7. Role and Function

It has already been noted that in order for States to fulfil their international human rights obligations, it is vital to establish domestic infrastructure and institutions to promote and protect rights at domestic level. Further, it is desirable that these institutions fulfil the criteria set out in the Paris Principles and the Commonwealth Secretariat Best Practice Guide. However, some small island states lack the resources and infrastructure for a human rights commission. In such cases, an Ombudsman Office or even Public Defender may be created as an alternative. Ombudsman Offices and Public Defenders act as watchdogs of public administrative bodies, and in some cases also fulfil an explicit human rights mandate. Caiden’s International Handbook on the Ombudsman describes the role as follows:

"The ombudsman is an independent and non-partisan officer... often provided for in the Constitution, who supervises the administration. He deals with specific complaints from the public against administrative injustice and maladministration. He has the power to investigate, report upon and make recommendations about individual cases and administrative procedures. He is not a judge or a tribunal, he has no powers to make orders or to reverse administrative action. He seeks solutions to problems by a process of investigation and conciliation. His authority and influence derive from the fact that he is appointed by and reports to one of the principle organs of the state, usually either the parliament or the chief executive."

The notion of the Ombudsman was first conceived in Sweden in 1809. However, it was Great Britain’s 1968 model of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration that is the most widely followed today. This model is referred to as the ‘classic Ombudsman’. It usually consists of a public official, appointed by the executive, who is responsible for the investigation of complaints and maladministration in the public law sphere (usually of different arms of the state like the police or prisons). The British Parliamentary Ombudsman sits between the legislature and the executive (and is closely linked to the latter), but is designed to be an extension of parliament.

167 A comprehensive discussion of the British model is beyond the scope of this study. However, for more information see Bradley, A.W., and Ewing, K.D., Constitutional and Administrative Law (14th Ed.) Edinburgh: Pearson Education Limited, 2007, pp. 715-724 (hereinafter ‘Bradley & Ewing’). Note that the British model is derived from the Ombudsman model found in Scandinavian countries and New Zealand, but was designed to fit within the structure of existing British institutional remedies. See also Fenwick, H., and Phillipson, P. (2nd Ed.) Text Cases Materials on Public Law and Human Rights, Cavendish Publishing Limited: Abingdon, 2003, pp. 792-835.
The two central functions of an Ombudsman are:

1. Improving administrative efficiency of public bodies and government departments; and

2. Bridging the gap between the government and the people.\(^{168}\)

The Ombudsman fulfills an important public agenda by working towards limiting governmental power and governing the relationship between the citizen and the State. The establishment of an Ombudsman therefore reflects a commitment to the rule of law and principle of legality.

The status and jurisdiction of the Ombudsman is governed by statute.\(^{169}\)

The Ombudsman forms no part of the judiciary\(^ {170}\) and has no legal power to grant remedies. He/she simply reports to parliament.

The value of the Office of Ombudsman is its accessibility, flexibility and relative informality.\(^ {171}\) This may be more effective in investigating allegations of maladministration and uncovering the factual truth than a traditional formal adversarial or inquisitorial process.

The hybrid Ombudsman model\(^ {172}\) combines jurisdiction over maladministration with human rights. The classic Ombudsman model does not have an express human rights mandate. However, in practice, some Ombudsman Offices adopt a human rights based approach to their work, due in part to the nature of the complaints or grievances against public authorities which are submitted to them, including those regarding prison conditions, the police, local government, social security, health care, mental health, child care and support, education, tax and pensions.

Whilst there are some similarities, the scope of the powers of investigation of the Ombudsman varies. In Trinidad and Tobago, the Ombudsman is limited to investigations of decisions or recommendations made by government departments. The Guyana Ombudsman’s powers are limited to investigations of actions (not decisions) of government in the exercise of administrative functions.\(^ {173}\) In contrast, the Barbados Ombudsman’s investigatory powers are much broader, adopting almost a judicial review approach to the grounds of investigations – i.e. injustice caused by improper, unreasonable or inadequate conduct on the part of a government ministry or public authority.

Of the Ombudsman Offices examined in this study, only Papua New Guinea, Namibia and Jamaica fulfilled an express human rights mandate. The other States examined – Antigua and Barbuda, Trinidad and Tobago, Barbados and Guyana – adopted a classic Ombudsman model. More detailed analysis is set out below.

7.2 Legal framework of the Commonwealth Ombudsman

The jurisdiction of the Ombudsman (usually set out in statute) is generally limited to matters that are not met by Constitutional remedies. The jurisdiction of the Ombudsman may be further limited by the exclusion of certain spheres of governmental activity or specifically named bodies from the remit of investigation. Thus the Ombudsman may be denied jurisdiction in matters relating to criminal law enforcement or grant of honours, government departments responsible for education, national ownership of industry and the activities of the armed forces.\(^{174}\) This obviously impacts on the efficacy of the office.

The enabling legislation spells out the jurisdiction, powers and functions of the Office of Ombudsman. The Ombudsman commonly conducts investigations, disseminates information, raises awareness and conducts public education programmes. The most important function is that of investigation. The nature of the Ombudsman’s investigatory powers is usually contingent upon the type of model of the Ombudsman – i.e., whether it follows the classic model or the human rights model. However, the line between the two is not distinct where the maladministration of public bodies also raises human rights concerns. The Ombudsman must have regard to constitutionally protected rights and international human rights instruments.

All Ombudsmen formally investigate and resolve complaints and issue recommendations. However, such recommendations are not legally enforceable. This undermines the strength of the Office. However, an Ombudsman can nevertheless exert influence over government in practical terms through the widespread publication of his/her findings and recommendations. Thus, albeit that the Ombudsman does not possess coercive powers, the status of the Office means that adverse findings are politically embarrassing for the government. Social pressure may therefore be brought to bear on a recommendation presented to parliament.

7.4 Commentary on Individual Ombudsman Offices

Papua New Guinea
The Ombudsman Commission of Papua New Guinea operates as a hybrid public institution. Its mandate includes the protection of human rights and anti-discrimination, as well as the classic function of watchdog of government administration. The Commission model empowers multiple office-holders to exercise constitutional powers, rather than a single specified person. 179

Antigua and Barbuda
The main functions of the Ombudsman of Antigua and Barbuda are to investigate any complaint relating to any decision or recommendation made or any act done or omitted by any officer of the government or statutory body in any case in which a member of the public claims to be aggrieved, or appears to the Ombudsman to have sustained injustice as a result of the administrative functions of that officer or body. 180 The government bodies that can be scrutinised are defined in an exhaustive list in the Act. This list excludes the investigation of complaints relating to powers conferred on the Governor-General by the Constitution or to any decision or recommendation made or taken by the Director of Public Prosecutions or any decision in respect of the Director of Audit.

The Ombudsman does not possess any express human rights mandate, but in practice, he/she is frequently called upon to perform such related functions when dealing with complaints of maladministration in the public service, for example, when investigating complaints regarding abuse of police powers. 181

Trinidad and Tobago
The Ombudsman is charged with a four-point mandate:
- increasing public awareness of the Office;
- accessibility to the public;
- gaining public confidence; and
- resolving complaints satisfactorily for complaints and officials. 182

The Ombudsman has fairly well established investigatory and advisory competence to meet these objectives. Of particular importance is the power (possessed by many NHRIs) to enter and inspect any premises over which he/she has jurisdiction. The Ombudsman's power in such circumstances extends to the power to call and examine witnesses and if appropriate seize documents. 183

Namibia
The Ombudsman of Namibia has one of the broadest mandates, which includes the duty to promote and protect human rights, ensure fair and effective administration, combat corrupt practices and protect the environment and natural resources of Namibia through 181 Ibid.

the independent and impartial investigation and resolution of complaints and by raising public awareness.\textsuperscript{184}

However, the Ombudsman’s power of investigation is limited in terms of complaints received – he/she may not initiate investigations. A noteworthy point here is the different powers of investigation and enforcement which the Ombudsman has in relation to each of the areas of his/her mandate.

The recommendations of the Ombudsman regarding maladministration are accorded greatest force. The Ombudsman can apply to the High Court to obtain an interdict to enforce recommendations or their implementation or prevent further maladministration. Further, the Ombudsman may, following investigation, recommend the more expeditious processing of applications to relevant ministries. The Constitution entitles individuals to ‘approach a competent Court to enforce or protect such a right or freedom, and may approach the Ombudsman to provide them with such legal assistance or advice as they require, and the Ombudsman shall have the discretion in response thereto to provide such legal or other assistance as he or she may consider expedient’ (Article 25(2)).

The Ombudsman sees the power to investigate complaints relating to the environment as an adjunct of the right of sustainable development, due to its close nexus with exploitation of mineral resources and eco-systems. This can give rise to competing claims (for example, in situations such as the creation of dams or degradation of land belonging to indigenous minority groups). The importance placed on the right to development by the Ombudsman of Namibia is fairly unique.

Jamaica

The Office of Public Defender in Jamaica replaced the classic model of Ombudsman Office on 16 April 2000. The powers and functions of the Ombudsman were split between the Office of the Public Defender (by the Public Defender Act 1999) and the Political Ombudsman, a Parliamentary Commission. The Public Defender was given the jurisdiction for the first time to investigate alleged violations of an individual’s Constitutional rights. The first Public Defender took up his office on 17 April 2000.

The Public Defender can only investigate complaints by individuals or groups who have sustained injustice or suffering. This is akin to the admissibility criteria in international human rights enforcement mechanisms, where the complainant must actually be a ‘victim’ of a human rights violation (see for example, Article 34 ECHR). The power to investigate complaints of maladministration is based on novel grounds, which differ to those included in the enabling legislation of other Ombudsman Offices and include the following:

\begin{itemize}
  \item i. ‘When a service takes longer to be provided than it should;
  \item ii. When service is not conducted in the right and proper manner;
  \item iii. When persons are not treated fairly;
  \item iv. When rules are not followed; and \item v. When faulty systems are used.’\textsuperscript{185} \end{itemize}

\textsuperscript{184} http://www.ombudsman.org.na/

\textsuperscript{185} http://www.opd.gov.jm/index.php
The Public Defender also pursues important initiatives in the field of human rights, with a current focus on slavery and human trafficking.

Barbados
There is very little available information on the work of the office of Ombudsman of Barbados to add further commentary at this stage.

Guyana
There is insufficient up-to-date information available on the work of the office of Ombudsman of Guyana to add further commentary at this stage.

Belize
The Ombudsman of Belize does not have an express human rights mandate. However, human rights aspects may feature in investigations of injury, injustice or abuse by the actions or omissions of Government agencies. In particular, the Ombudsman of Belize focuses on abuse of police powers and maladministration within that department and is mandated to protect rights and freedoms of persons involved in the criminal law system. The Ombudsman has endeavoured to change the conceptualisation of human rights, by public officials (in particular the police) as being inconsistent with criminal law enforcement and entitlements which only benefit vagrants and the lawless.
8 Conclusions

The role of National Human Rights Institutions and the Office of Ombudsman in the promotion and protection of human rights is critical. Independence is a prerequisite to the effective implementation of the mandates of both institutions. A perceived or actual lack of independence will undermine the work, authority and legitimacy of these organisations. Likewise, NHRIs and Ombudsman Offices with weak or limited enforcement powers may become dependent on government institutions to resolve complaints and provide adequate remedies. This too will weaken their mandate and status.

The evolution of human rights protection takes place in a time of significant legal and political change. The global challenges of terrorism, globalisation, climate change and natural disasters, migration flows and internally displaced persons and armed conflict are significant. In the current climate, it becomes ever more vital to defend and protect established international human rights standards, challenge abuses of State power and limit maladministration in public offices. NHRIs and Ombudsman Offices have important and difficult work to do. We must all support them in their struggle to meet the challenges that lie ahead.

186 See for example the Stern Review on climate change available from http://www.hm-treasury.gov.uk/independent_reviews/sterne_review_economics_climate_change/sterne_review_index.cfm For its impact on all 53 Commonwealth states, see the comments of the Commonwealth Secretariat Deputy Secretary General Ransford Smith on 12 September 2006 at http://www.thecommonwealth.org/news/155947/commonwealth_welcomes_call_for_action_on_climate_c.htm (last accessed 14 June 2007). Note also that the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights has accepted and will hear a petition filed by Inuit living in the Arctic, seeking relief from violations resulting from global warming caused by acts and emissions of the United States. See also Lopez Ostra v. Spain (App. No. 16798/90, judgment of 9 December 1994) where the European Court of Human Rights held that Spain’s failure to prevent a waste treatment plant from polluting nearby homes violated the petitioner’s ‘right to respect for her home and her private and family life’.
9 Annexes

9.1 Normative Framework

9.1.1 Principles relating to the status and functioning of national institutions for protection and promotion of human rights – the ‘Paris Principles’
Adopted by General Assembly resolution 48/134 of 20 December 1993

COMPETENCE AND RESPONSIBILITIES

1. A national institution shall be vested with competence to promote and protect human rights.

2. A national institution shall be given as broad a mandate as possible, which shall be clearly set forth in a constitutional or legislative text, specifying its composition and its sphere of competence.

3. A national institution shall, inter alia, have the following responsibilities:

(a) To submit to the Government, Parliament and any other competent body, on an advisory basis either at the request of the authorities concerned or through the exercise of its power to hear a matter without higher referral, opinions, recommendations, proposals and reports on any matters concerning the promotion and protection of human rights; the national institution may decide to publicise them; these opinions, recommendations, proposals and reports, as well as any prerogative of the national institution, shall relate to the following areas:

(i) Any legislative or administrative provisions, as well as provisions relating to judicial organizations, intended to preserve and extend the protection of human rights; in that connection, the national institution shall examine the legislation and administrative provisions in force, as well as bills and proposals, and shall make such recommendations as it deems appropriate in order to ensure that these provisions conform to the fundamental principles of human rights; it shall, if necessary, recommend the adoption of new legislation, the amendment of legislation in force and the adoption or amendment of administrative measures;

(ii) Any situation of violation of human rights which it decides to take up;

(iii) The preparation of reports on the national situation with regard to human rights in general, and on more specific matters;

(iv) Drawing the attention of the Government to situations in any part of the country where human rights are violated and making proposals to it for initiatives to put an end to such situations and, where necessary, expressing an opinion on the positions and reactions of the Government;

(b) To promote and ensure the harmonisation of national legislation, regulations and practices with the international human rights instruments to which the State is a party, and their effective implementation;

(c) To encourage ratification of the above-mentioned instruments or accession to those instruments, and to ensure their implementation;

(d) To contribute to the reports which States are required to submit to United Nations bodies and committees, and to regional institutions, pursuant to their treaty obligations and, where necessary, to express an opinion on the subject, with due respect for their independence;

(e) To co-operate with the United Nations and any other organization in the United Nations system, the regional institutions and the national institutions of other countries that are competent in the areas of the protection and promotion of human rights;

(f) To assist in the formulation of programmes for the teaching of, and research into, human rights and to take part in their execution in schools, universities and professional circles;

(g) To publicise human rights and efforts to combat all forms of discrimination, in particular racial discrimination, by increasing public awareness, especially through information and education and by making use of all press organs.

COMPOSITION AND GUARANTEES OF INDEPENDENCE AND PLURALISM

1. The composition of the national institution and the appointment of its members, whether by means of an election or otherwise, shall be established in accordance with a procedure which affords all necessary guarantees to ensure the pluralist representation of the social forces (of civilian society) involved in the protection and promotion of human rights, particularly by powers which will enable effective co-operation to be established with, or through the presence of, representatives of:

(a) Non-governmental organizations responsible for human rights and efforts to combat racial discrimination, trade unions, concerned social and professional organizations, for example, associations of lawyers, doctors, journalists and eminent scientists;

(b) Trends in philosophical or religious thought;

(c) Universities and qualified experts;

(d) Parliament;

(e) Government departments (if these are included, their representatives should participate in the deliberations only in an advisory capacity).

2. The national institution shall have an infrastructure which is suited to the smooth conduct of its activities, in particular adequate funding. The purpose of this funding should be to enable it to have its own staff and premises, in order to be independent of the Government and not be subject to financial control which might affect its independence.
3. In order to ensure a stable mandate for the members of the national institution, without which there can be no real independence, their appointment shall be effected by an official act which shall establish the specific duration of the mandate. This mandate may be renewable, provided that the pluralism of the institution’s membership is ensured.

METHODS OF OPERATION
Within the framework of its operation, the national institution shall:
(a) Freely consider any questions falling within its competence, whether they are submitted by the Government or taken up by it without referral to a higher authority, on the proposal of its members or of any petitioner,
(b) Hear any person and obtain any information and any documents necessary for assessing situations falling within its competence;
(c) Address public opinion directly or through any press organ, particularly in order to publicise its opinions and recommendations;
(d) Meet on a regular basis and whenever necessary in the presence of all its members after they have been duly concerned;
(e) Establish working groups from among its members as necessary, and set up local or regional sections to assist it in discharging its functions;
(f) Maintain consultation with the other bodies, whether jurisdictional or otherwise, responsible for the promotion and protection of human rights (in particular, ombudsmen, mediators and similar institutions);
(g) In view of the fundamental role played by the non-governmental organizations in expanding the work of the national institutions, develop relations with the non-governmental organizations devoted to promoting and protecting human rights, to economic and social development, to combating racism, to protecting particularly vulnerable groups (especially children, migrant workers, refugees, physically and mentally disabled persons) or to specialised areas.

Additional principles concerning the status of commissions with quasi-jurisdictional competence
A national institution may be authorised to hear and consider complaints and petitions concerning individual situations. Cases may be brought before it by individuals, their representatives, third parties, non-governmental organizations, and associations of trade unions or any other representative organizations. In such circumstances, and without prejudice to the principles stated above concerning the other powers of the commissions, the functions entrusted to them may be based on the following principles:
(a) Seeking an amicable settlement through conciliation or, within the limits prescribed by the law, through binding decisions or, where necessary, on the basis of confidentiality;
(b) Informing the party who filed the petition of his rights, in particular the remedies available to him, and promoting his access to them;
(c) Hearing any complaints or petitions or transmitting them to any other competent authority within the limits prescribed by the law;
(d) Making recommendations to the competent authorities, especially by proposing amendments or reforms of the laws, regulations and administrative practices, especially if they have created the difficulties encountered by the persons filing the petitions in order to assert their rights.

9.1.2 National Human Rights Institutions:
Amnesty International's recommendations for effective protection and promotion of human rights
AI Index IOR 40/007/2001 1 October 2001

INTRODUCTION: STANDARDS ARE A PRE-REQUISITE FOR EFFECTIVE ACTION
National human rights institutions (NHRIs) include institutions such as ombudspersons for the defense of human rights, and the institutions in Latin America known as 'defensorias del pueblo' and 'procuradorias de derechos humanos'. Such NHRIs can be distinguished from non-governmental human rights organisations by their very establishment as a quasi-governmental agency occupying a unique place between the judicial and executive functions of the state, and where these exist, the elected representatives of the people. The aim of their establishment should be to promote and protect human rights, through effective investigation of broad human rights concerns and individuals' complaints about human rights violations they have suffered, and through making recommendations accordingly.

Amnesty International has developed the following recommendations, based on the organisation's observations of the work of NHRIs and their impact throughout the world. This document includes examples of good and bad practice. Amnesty International believes that these recommendations are essential elements to ensure the independent and effective establishment and functioning of national human rights institutions. They should be considered alongside other guidelines such as the ‘Principles relating to the status of national institutions’ (adopted in the UN Commission on Human Rights Resolution 1992/54, known as ‘the Paris Principles’) as a tool both to assess the effectiveness of existing national human rights institutions, and to ensure that new NHRIs are set up with the requisite ingredients for effective and independent functioning.

The recommendations set out in this document are Amnesty International’s assessment of a foundation for effective work to promote and protect human rights. However, implementation of these recommendations on a formal level should not be seen as an end in itself. NHRIs should be judged on their results in effecting improvement in the human rights situation in their country, and in providing investigations and remedies in individual cases. The results of their investigations should be open to scrutiny by civil society, including human rights defenders. They should work to combat impunity for all those who order, carry out, and cover up human rights violations. NHRIs should be judged on how they implement these goals, not solely on their legal or institutional framework. Amnesty International has received reports of many examples of good practices and good results in these aims, but also many shortcomings and these recommendations are meant to encourage best practices in all NHRIs. It is Amnesty International’s experience that those NHRIs which have been set up according to the principles in these recommendations and are functioning well and enjoy a level of credibility and trust which facilitates their relationship with the executive, the judiciary and most importantly, the victims of human rights violations, and makes their work even more effective.

Some of the recommendations concern the establishment of NHRI and as such are aimed at governments, but others concern the operation of NHRI, and are therefore aimed at governments, so that they can do all that is necessary to facilitate the efficient running of NHRI, but also the NHRI themselves. They may also be useful to those in civil society who are monitoring their performance.

The position of NHRI as institutions within the state structure and yet independent - and where necessary, critical - is relatively new development in the protection of human rights. It is important to clarify their true role: NHRI should never be seen as a replacement or alternative to an independent, impartial, properly resourced, accessible judiciary, whose rulings are enforced. NHRI can however constitute an effective complement to the judiciary and other institutions within the state in promoting and protecting human rights standards. There can be no alternative to a determined government policy to holding the perpetrators of human rights violations accountable.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL'S RECOMMENDATIONS ON EFFECTIVE PROTECTION AND PROMOTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

1. Establishment of NHRI to ensure independence and effective action

The following recommendations on the establishment are to ensure that action can be taken by the NHRI in full independence and to ensure its ability to take effective action to address violations. Formal independence without effective action is not sufficient.

1.1 Founding legislation

NHRI must be independent from the executive functions of government and its founding charter should reflect this. It is essential therefore that NHRI should be established by law or, preferably, by constitutional amendment. Where NHRI are established merely by presidential or other kinds of decree, it is easier to abolish them, or to limit powers which are necessary to their effective functioning.

1.2 Consultation with civil society

The consultation process on and about the establishment of NHRI should include representatives of civil society, such as human rights organisations, human rights defenders, lawyers, journalists, academics, the medical profession, social workers, trade unionists, and non-governmental organisations generally. Members of sectors of the population such as women, children and those representing their interests, religious, ethnic and racial groups, and other groups which are vulnerable to human rights violations (and which may be under-represented amongst civil society bodies) should also be consulted about the kind of assistance they require to promote and protect their human rights. The consultation process should be transparent, adequate, effective and properly resourced to ensure proper consultation.

1.3 Effective jurisdiction in federal states

Amnesty International has frequently noted that NHRI have difficulties in ensuring that they can address violations throughout the territory of federal states. In some federal countries, NHRI have been established with mandates that only permit them to consider cases where federal personnel commit human rights violations, or where human rights violations take place during the enforcement of federal law.
Amnesty International recommends therefore that any legislation in federal systems setting up an NHRI is made explicitly applicable to all parts of the federal system so that there are no de facto gaps in jurisdiction. Any NHRI, whether in a federal state or otherwise, should be able to examine all human rights violations, as defined by international human rights law, throughout the country’s territory and regardless of the identity of the perpetrator.

All citizens with complaints of human rights violations should be able to bring them to an NHRI.

1.4 Co-operation with other institutions
The founding legislation of an NHRI should include provisions whereby the NHRI is empowered, on its own initiative, to submit reports to, and where appropriate, to address in person, legislative bodies, the executive, or other political institutions.

The NHRI should be directed to establish effective co-operation with other human rights institutions, whether domestic or from other countries, non-governmental organisations, including human rights organisations, and UN human rights bodies. In some cases, it may be useful to develop memoranda of understanding between NHRI and other institutions to facilitate such relationships. NHRI should use such contacts to exchange first-hand information about reports of human rights violations and also to share expertise and experience of best practices.

The NHRI should consider using the NGO sector’s wider social outreach mechanics, which in many cases is larger than that of the NHRI itself, to publicise its activities and to facilitate receiving complaints from sections of society who are either geographically, politically or socially remote. In all its contacts with NGOs and other organs of civil society an NHRI must take steps to protect its independence and impartiality.

1.5 Referrals
Where complainants raise problems which are outside the mandate of the NHRI, referrals may be appropriate to other organisations. This may be appropriate to help with, for example, medical, housing or social problems or consumer difficulties, particularly where complainants coming to the NHRI for help are having difficulties in obtaining assistance. In one case reported to Amnesty International, the NHRI gives the complainant a short letter on NHRI letterhead to bring to the referral agency outlining the problem and suggesting an appropriate response, which frequently leads to a quicker solution for the complainant and is a much appreciated service.

1.6 Assess priorities, measure goals, follow up
NHRI frequently have a broad remit and scarce resources. It is therefore important to assess priorities through consultation with those affected and work on priorities strategically, ensuring that those goals are met before ending work on the issue.

Violations of the right to life and the right to physical and mental integrity frequently involve crimes under international law, such as extrajudicial and other unlawful killings, torture, ‘disappearance’, war crimes and crimes against humanity. In many countries NHRI will need to prioritise work on such violations in order to be effective and credible in their work to protect and promote human rights.
NHRIs should also be empowered to take action on violations of other rights particularly social, cultural and economic rights.

NHRIs should assess priorities and needs through consultation with victims of human rights violations, and the availability of redress through other institutions within the country.

2. Membership
NHRIs require experienced, trained and skilled staff, and particularly strong, independent and effective leadership. NHRIs workers include those who lead the NHRI and take main responsibility for the work. In many cases they are appointed by the legislative or executive parts of government. Amnesty International refers to them in this document as ‘members.’ NHRI workers also include the staff who assist them, either through administrative or substantive investigative and legal work.

2.1 Qualities of members of the NHRI
Members should be selected on the basis of proven expertise, knowledge and experience in the promotion and protection of human rights. They should have practical expertise and abilities.

2.2 Leadership
It is Amnesty International’s experience that the leadership of NHRIs is particularly important, indeed vital, for the effective functioning of NHRIs, as frequently the actions of the senior leadership of the organisation sets the tone for the activities of the institution as a whole. It is of primary importance that the highest calibre candidates, with proven expertise of practical human rights work, be appointed.

2.3 Selection procedures and consultation
The independent procedures of selection, appointment, removal and terms of tenure of NHRI members and staff should be clearly specified, laid down in its founding legislation, so as to afford the strongest possible guarantees of competence, impartiality and independence.

The selection, appointment, and removal procedures of the members of the NHRI should not be handled exclusively by the executive branch of government.

The method of selection and appointment of the members of the NHRI should be fair and transparent, so as to afford all necessary guarantees of independence. Broad representation is also important, and steps should be taken to guarantee this - for example - by allowing members of civil society to nominate possible candidates for membership of the NHRI.

The selection and appointment process should involve representatives of civil society, especially human rights defenders representing the interests of particularly vulnerable sections of society (and members of those groups also), and may also include NGOs, opposition leaders, trade unionists, social workers, journalists.

Civil society should participate in the selection and appointment process as far as possible.

2.4 Representation of society
The NHRI members and staff should as far as possible include representation of all sections of society, including women, ethnic minorities, and people with disabilities, who may be under-represented in other official bodies and would have particular relevant experience of the needs of those sectors of society. Non-nationals should not be deterred or specifically prohibited from taking up a post at the NHRI.

2.5 Freedom from bias and expectations for further career advancement
The members and staff should consist of men and women known for their integrity and impartiality of judgment who shall decide matters before them on the basis of facts and in accordance with the law, without any restrictions, improper influences, inducements, pressures, threats or interferences from any quarter or for any reason, for example, allegiances to political parties, or strong links with the executive part of government.

In some cases, there may be an expectation that office in an NHRI is a stepping stone leading to ministerial or other political office which limits the independence of NHRI members and staff - as with such expectations, they may be less willing to criticise the executive.

Salaries and working conditions have a positive role to play in recruiting and retaining effective staff, and in ensuring independence. This, along with local factors, such as salary levels for similar positions, whether in the public or private sector, must be taken into account when setting and revising staff terms and conditions.

2.6 Effective support to fulfil tasks
There should be sufficient staffing to fulfil the tasks allotted to the NHRI. The key issue is to ensure effective oversight and action. NHRIs must have a functioning and efficient secretariat to carry out the tasks entrusted to the members.

2.7 Privileges and immunities
Like the judiciary, members of NHRIs should be immune from criminal or civil legal action for all tasks undertaken by them in the proper exercise of their official functions. However, decisions made by them in their official capacity should still be subject to judicial review by the courts.

3. Mandate and powers
The mandate should make the NHRI truly independent in action, to promote and protect human rights in whatever manner is most appropriate. It should not be set up as a purely advisory body to advise the government, rather it should listen to victims of human rights violations, and have their concerns at the heart of its work. It should also work to promote a culture of respect for human rights through education and raising of awareness of human rights issues.

The scope of the NHRI’s concerns should be principally and clearly defined in terms of international human rights law. This should include states’ obligations under international law to respect and also to ensure that rights are respected by all, that is, to take steps to ensure that domestic law and practice form a framework where the abuses of human rights by non-state actors are effectively addressed. NHRIs should make recommendations for changes in law and practice where states are not fulfilling their obligation be able to take reasonable steps to protect citizens from abuses of their human rights by other citizens.
3.1 Scope of human rights within an NHRI's jurisdiction

NHRIs should enjoy the broadest possible mandate to address human rights concerns as set out in international human rights law and standards. The mandate should not be defined solely in terms of those rights that are specifically provided for in the country's constitution - particularly as some constitutions do not contain key rights such as the right to life. Rather NHRIs should take as their frame of reference the definitions of human rights as set out in international human rights instruments and standards, whether or not the state has ratified the relevant treaties. The mandate should include the power to protect and promote economic, social and cultural rights, as well as civil and political rights.

This is particularly important to ensure that human rights violations are monitored and acted upon in an accurate way. For example, Amnesty International has received reports that cases of torture are routinely described as 'abuses of official position' rather than torture, which leads to a misleading assessment of human rights violations occurring in the country, as well as a failure to take appropriate action.

3.2 Accountability to ensure effective action

NHRIs should report publicly on their activities and be held accountable for their results - either to an independent civil society body, or to a functioning and exacting parliamentary body. This is particularly important as an ineffective NHRI which does not address human rights violations actively can be an instrument of impunity, rather than a tool to promote and protect human rights.

3.3 Asserting human rights for all

The mandate should include the power specifically to promote and protect the rights those sections of society which are particularly at risk of violations of human rights, for example, children, women, people with disabilities, ethnic minorities, refugees, human rights defenders and non-nationals such as asylum-seekers and migrant workers. It should promote the right not to suffer discrimination, as this is often the source and motivation of other human rights violations, such as torture.

Frequently Amnesty International has received information indicating that NHRIs encounter difficulties because they are perceived to be promoting the rights of criminals because of their work on prison conditions, or the torture of criminal suspects. It is therefore important that all NHRIs emphasise the universal applicability of human rights standards to all persons.

3.4 Participation in international human rights law fora

NHRIs should recommend and facilitate the signature, ratification or accession of its state to new human rights treaties.

The mandate should include the power to monitor government fulfilment of international and regional human rights treaties and human rights obligations under domestic law. This should include the power to monitor and report - independently on its own behalf, not on behalf of its government - on implementation of relevant and necessary international human rights standards, essential to the promotion and protection of human rights, including the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Cultural and Political Rights (ICCPR), the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights...
(ICESCR), the UN Declaration and Convention against Torture, the Convention of the Rights of the Child, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, as well as the Declaration on the Right and Responsibility of Individuals, Groups and Organs of Society to Promote and Protect Universally Recognized Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the UN Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials, the UN Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment, the UN Rules for the Protection of Juveniles Deprived of their Liberty, the Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials and the UN Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary or Summary Executions. They should also assess compliance with standards relating to the administration of justice, such as the Basic Principles on the Role of Lawyers, the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, the Guidelines on the Role of Prosecutors, and the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power.

NHRIs should as far as possible attend and participate in international meetings and fora including the treaty monitoring bodies and UN political bodies concerned with human rights. When doing so, they should represent themselves as independent NHRIs, rather than representing their government.

NHRIs should have the power to take note of and ultimately apply international human rights law and standards in their work. It is essential therefore that NHRIs establish effective means to keep abreast of recent developments of international human rights law and standards.

The NHRI should possess the power to follow-up on recommendations and reports made in relation to implementation and compliance with international human rights standards mentioned above. This should include a suitable framework within which the NHRI may compel the relevant authority to explain and report to the NHRI, within a reasonable period of time, as to why, for example, it has not followed and did not apply recommendations made by human rights treaty bodies or thematic mechanisms.

NHRIs should prepare ‘shadow reports’ (reports of their assessment of the human rights situation in their country) to submit to the UN human rights treaty monitoring bodies on their own behalf; they should not write the state’s reports to treaty monitoring bodies.

3.5 Advising governments on domestic legislation

The mandate should include the power to review the effectiveness of existing legislation or administrative provisions in protecting human rights and should be able to make recommendations for the amendment of such legislation or the introduction of new legislation as necessary.

This is especially important regarding internal security laws, administrative detention laws, and police detention and interrogation procedures, which can often facilitate human rights violations, or where enabling legislation implementing international standards does not implement the international obligations effectively.

The NHRI should also examine bills and proposals for new legislation put forward by the government or parliament to assess its conformity with international human rights standards and to ensure the state=s compliance with international human rights standards.

3.6 Participation in domestic legal cases
NHRIs should have the power to bring legal cases to protect the rights of individuals or to promote changes in law and practice. Amnesty International has received information about excellent work including the use of legal applications such as judicial review, constitutional applications and challenges, etc.

NHRIs should have the legal power to bring applications on behalf of those who may be unable to bring cases to protect their rights themselves (for example, children, those with mental health problems or otherwise lacking mental capacity, prisoners).

NHRIs should also have the legal power to bring cases (such as judicial review) to challenge the legality of executive action and to obtain judicial orders to remedy the situation, particularly where the executive has ignored the NHRIs recommendations on the subject.

NHRIs must also have the legal power to submit advice to the courts, such as amicus curiae briefs or third party interventions, on legal issues within its field of expertise in an independent capacity, without being a party to the case. This is important to ensure that the courts are informed about specialised human rights law concerns and to ensure that human rights standards are actively implemented in court decisions.

3.7 Effective communication with government to bring about change
NHRIs should be mindful of their official position within state structures and communicate their recommendations confidently and with the expectation that the executive part of government, or the prosecuting authorities, should implement them.

NHRIs should open strong and effective methods of communication with all agencies of government, the prosecuting authorities and the judiciary in order to promote their recommendations, and should ensure compliance with recommendations, and not accept recommendations being ignored. NHRIs should also make recommendations to parts of the state, for example, the judiciary and the legislative organs.

4. Investigations and Inquiries

4.A General recommendations on investigations
The NHRI should have the powers to conduct wide-ranging national enquiries on human rights concerns; they should have access to government information; they should respond to victims’ concerns in their investigations.

4.A.1 Time limits
Although some reasonable time limits may be used to ensure that complainants come forward speedily with their complaints, NHRIs should undertake any investigation where there is evidence in existence to consider: they should not be inhibited by arbitrary time limits on investigations, and should not be inflexible in rejecting cases for being brought to their attention outside of time limits.

4.A.2 Power to investigate on its own initiative
NHRIs should have precisely defined powers to investigate on its own initiative situations and cases of reported human rights violations. It should be able to set clear priorities for its work in accordance with the seriousness of the violations reported to it, specifically including alleged violations of the right to life and security of the person, and the right to physical and mental integrity, including the right not to be tortured; as well as to the right not to be arbitrarily arrested or detained.

Many NHRIs lose credibility within their countries by failing to engage with such issues directly, and instead focusing almost exclusively on human rights education or promotion or implementation of those rights which involve less criticism of the government.

NHRIs should accept information from any reliable source, and should co-operate with national and international NGOs.

4.A.3 Investigating individual cases and wider patterns
Pending completion of investigations the NHRI should always identify any systematic pattern of human rights violations, and address the root causes, rather than solely treating each case in isolation. They should not look at individual cases in isolation, nor report abstractly on trends and developments - rather they should focus on the facts of individual cases, and identifying patterns, using well-researched, well-attested and evidenced cases.

4.A.4 Persistent problems and root causes
In their reports, NHRIs should conduct a critical analysis of the factors which have contributed to the persistence of human rights violations within the national territory. This should include an assessment of the failure of existing institutions and legal mechanisms to provide adequate human rights protection, and its links with impunity, the administration of justice, and for example, treatment of foreign nationals, women, and prisoners.

Recommendations for legal and institutional reform to address human rights violations should be proposed on the basis of the findings.

4.A.5 Addressing all perpetrators without fear
Many NHRIs undermine themselves and lose credibility by asking the alleged violators of human rights - such as the armed forces or the police - to investigate allegations of violations of human rights themselves, rather than the NHRI making an investigation itself. On some occasions, NHRIs simply forward the complainant's initial communication of his or her complaint to the alleged perpetrators (including the complainant's name, address, and other details) to ask the alleged perpetrators, or their colleagues, to investigate. This does not constitute an impartial investigation and can put complainants at risk.

Especially, NHRIs should be authorised to investigate the conduct of the police and the security forces throughout the national territory, and should promptly, effectively, independently and impartially carry out such investigations - especially in situations of internal armed conflict, and during states of emergency. This authorisation should not just be made explicit in its implementing legislation, it should also be made a practical reality in its work. NHRIs should not be debarred from operating during states of emergency.

NHRIs should also undertake investigations into human rights violations, even if those responsible include politicians or other powerful agents in society. To do this... effectively, the NHRI should have adequate facilities to conduct thorough investigations, independent of the security forces, whose conduct it will be called upon to assess. It should also have effective powers to protect its own staff and witnesses engaged in such investigations.

This is an all too frequent failure of NHRI s around the world, and a major cause of frustration and cynicism towards NHRI s from victims and the general population within countries, as well as NGOs, especially when the actions of major violators of human rights have not been addressed in a satisfactory way.

4 A.6 Compelling evidence
State officials should be legally obliged to co-operate with the NHRI s investigations. NHRI s should have full and effective powers to compel the attendance of witnesses and the disclosure and production of documents and other pieces of evidence. Effective sanctions should be in place to use when the NHRI s work is obstructed or otherwise interfered with.

4 A.7 Accurate statistics lead to an accurate picture of human rights violations
NHRI s should collect and publish accurate data on, for example, reports of ‘disappearances’, deaths in custody, rape and other forms of torture. Collection of data should be a by-product of day to day work, rather than an aim in itself. Statistics should detail the nature of the complaints, how and when they were investigated, the findings, and follow-up to recommendations.

4 B. Methodologies of investigation
In carrying out investigations NHRI s should pursue all available sources of information. These may include statements from victims, witnesses and alleged perpetrators; medical reports; police investigation files; court files; media reports; information from NGOs, families of victims and lawyers.

This is particularly important as investigations that, for example, simply constitute an examination of an existing police investigations file, may lead to a repetition of failures in investigation and in such cases, this may promote or contribute to impunity.

Amnesty International has also received information about cases where the onus of proof is on the complainant to prove his case, rather than the NHRI carrying out an investigation. NHRI s should always take steps to investigate information independently.

4 B.1 Independent investigation professionals
NHRI s should have their own investigative machinery and should have access to expert assistance (forensic pathologists, forensic doctors, ballistic experts, specialists on sexual violence etc.) whenever required to investigate alleged violations of human rights, particularly those involving physical injury (including injuries from sexual violence) and death. It is also important to have access to relevant experts to assist with interviews with victims who may be suffering from the psychological effects of torture, including sexual violence, to identify and record the psychological effects, and to ensure that interviews are conducted in a manner which does not lead to further psychological damage.
Sometimes it will be necessary to bring expertise in from outside the country, where no trained expertise is available.

Wherever possible, such forensic expertise should be at hand at short notice so that effective investigations and recording of, for example, injuries caused by torture or sexual violence, or post mortem investigations, can be made efficiently. When such reliable forensic information is available, then it is much more likely that effective action can be taken in prosecutions of perpetrators.

Such experts should be truly independent - frequently Amnesty International has received reports that such experts have strong links with state officials such as the police, as most of their work is for such state officials. Amnesty International has received some reports of investigators for NHRIIs who are actually police officers on secondment from the regular police forces - who were unwilling to investigate allegations against fellow police officers.

NHRIIs should have adequate facilities to carry out on-the-spot investigations, including transport, to be able to obtain access to any place in the territory where human rights violations take place.

4.B.2 Training
Effective and practical training of staff working on investigations - especially sharing of skills and best practice from colleagues abroad - should be a priority. Frequently investigations undertaken with good will fail because of lack of training in investigative sciences and skills. They should also receive training in international human rights law so that they can identify and understand legal issues regarding their investigations.

4.B.3 Protection of witnesses
NHRIIs should have full and effective access to mechanisms to ensure that witnesses, complainants, or others providing evidence to the NHRI are given appropriate protection. Mechanisms should be in place, which can be triggered by the NHRI, that can lead to the suspension or transfer of officials allegedly involved - without prejudice pending completion of investigations - to other duties where they would have no power over witnesses or complainants.

4.B.4 Protection of evidence
Evidence gathered during investigations, such as witness statements, reports (including reports such as post mortem examinations or other expert reports) and physical evidence (such as evidence gathered during exhumations) should be kept securely by the NHRI.

4.C. Individual complaints

4.C.1 Who can complain?
NHRIIs should have powers to begin investigations on its own initiative. It should be able to receive communications not only from the complainants themselves but also, if the complainants themselves are unable or prevented from doing so, from lawyers, relatives or others acting on their behalf, including non-governmental groups.

Individual complaints procedures should be free of charge.
It is important that all people have the opportunity to be represented in applications to NHRI's, regardless of their status under national law. Children, prisoners, the mentally ill, and foreign nationals, for example, must all have access to the NHRI.

4.C.2 Reaching out to victims
NHRI's should use networks of communication and outreach already existing among NGOs and civil society groups such as medical associations, to ensure that victims of human rights violations are aware of the procedures open to them.

4.C.3 Keeping the interests of victims at the centre of the process
Victims or relatives should have access to all relevant information and documents relating to the investigation into their complaints and be granted all necessary facilities to present evidence. Victims should in particular, be kept informed of the process of the NHRI's investigation, and be given reasons for decisions taken about their case, and consulted where there are choices as to how their case will develop.

NHRI's should be able to provide financial assistance to witnesses enabling them to travel and be accommodated in order to present their evidence before the NHRI.

Where the NHRI is unable to take up a case, for example, because it is outside its mandate, it should inform the complainant as soon as possible and give reasons for its decision.

4.D. Addressing failed investigations effectively
Where the police have made an inconclusive or otherwise unsatisfactory investigation, the NHRI should undertake a prompt, thorough, effective and impartial investigation and not be hampered or otherwise inhibited by following the conclusions of a previous investigation. Investigations should not simply constitute an examination of an existing police investigations file.

An NHRI which fails to investigate individual complaints effectively may be an instrument of impunity - rather than allowing a victim access to a remedy, it closes off opportunities to secure a remedy, deterring the reporting of abuses.

4.D.1 Separation of roles of the NHRI and the judiciary
A clear line should be drawn between appropriate roles for the NHRI and the judiciary. The NHRI should be able to investigate, but should not have judicial powers. The result of the NHRI's investigations should be referred to appropriate judicial bodies without delay so that they can take appropriate action.

Evidence obtained by NHRI's should not be made inadmissible in other proceedings simply by virtue of having been first given to the NHRI.

Amnesty International has received reports which indicate that some NHRI's consider that investigations by the police or the security forces prima facie are sufficient investigations. It is important that NHRI's make their own assessment of the effectiveness of such investigations and follow up themselves with prompt, effective, thorough and impartial investigations where existing internal police or army investigations, or judicial investigations are not effective.

Where the NHRI finds evidence that certain individuals may have been responsible for committing human rights violations or for ordering, encouraging or permitting them, the facts of the case should be investigated promptly, effectively, thoroughly and impartially by authorities empowered to bring criminal prosecutions, and if appropriate, those responsible should be brought to justice in legal proceedings which respect internationally-recognised rights to a fair trial, and do not lead to punishments involving torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, including the death penalty. NHRIs should have powers to recommend that superior officers are brought to justice for acts committed under their authority and should be mandated to closely follow subsequent legal proceedings in the case, by monitoring trials, or if necessary appearing before the court to make legal submissions to press for appropriate legal action to be taken within a reasonable time. If the NHRI, in the course of its work, is able to identify short-comings in the law whereby it is not possible to hold such officers accountable, the NHRI should make recommendations for legal reform that would ensure that domestic law does not facilitate impunity.

The government should ensure that any prosecutions for crimes involving the abuse of human rights are brought by authorities which are distinctly independent from the security forces or other bodies implicated in human rights violations.

4.D.2 Parallel jurisdiction of NHRI and the judiciary

The fact that a complainant has been charged and a criminal prosecution is under way should not be a pretext for stopping NHRIs from acting on a complaint, or taking any other action within their mandate to address human rights concerns.

Where prosecutions are pending, the NHRI should not consider the substance of the criminal charge, but should be able to look at ancillary matters relating to the human rights of the accused person, for example, allegations that he or she has been tortured while in custody.

In some jurisdictions, the NHRI is not permitted to receive complaints from a person who has been charged with an offence or who is otherwise under judicial supervision; therefore if the judiciary is not taking appropriate steps to protect the accused person from human rights violations such as torture and ill-treatment in custody, then that person is without recourse to protect their rights.

4.D.3 Role of NHRI in following up the actions of prosecutors and the judiciary in cases of criminal acts

Although it is important to maintain independence of function between the judiciary and the NHRI, the NHRI should monitor whether its recommendations are followed up. Amnesty International frequently receives reports that an NHRI has recommended that, on the basis of their investigations, criminal investigations and prosecutions should be initiated, but the police or prosecuting authorities take no action.

NHRIs should not stand by in silence where recommendations to investigate and bring prosecutions are ignored. In such cases, the NHRI should continue to request that the authorities take up the case, if necessary through domestic and international publicity, or where possible, to bring judicial review action challenging the decision of the prosecuting authorities. NHRIs should not be complicit with impunity.

Where domestic remedies for human rights violations are exhausted or ineffective, NHRIs should raise the matter with the international bodies mandated to assess compliance with human rights standards, such as the human rights treaty monitoring bodies, or the United Nations' thematic mechanisms and special procedures, such as the Special Rapporteurs.

5. Recommendations and non-judicial remedies

5.1 Remedies and interim measures

NHRIs should have powers to ensure effective non-judicial remedies, including interim measures to protect the life and safety of an individual and adequate medical treatment where necessary; it should ensure measures of redress and rehabilitation are taken in appropriate cases.

5.2 Remedies but not impunity

NHRIs should not broker agreements for only reparations, such as compensation, to be paid, where the appropriate response would rather be reparation and prosecution of the perpetrator - for example in cases of torture.

Amnesty International has received reports that some NHRIs order compensation for crimes such as torture, and where the government encourages this or other forms ofconciliation rather than bringing cases forward for prosecution. Conclusion of a case through friendly settlement should not prevent or hamper prosecutions for crimes under international law, such as torture, war crimes, or crimes against humanity.

5.3 Recommendations should be followed up

The government should undertake an obligation to respond, within a reasonable time, to the case-specific as well as the more general findings, conclusions and recommendations made by the NHRI. The government's response should be made public.

In cases where the government fails to respond, or refuses to respond or implement recommendations, the NHRI should continue to take all possible measures to press the government, for example, through pressure by the media, through parliament, and through international pressure of opinion and bringing the case to the attention of the international human rights bodies, such as the treaty monitoring bodies and the special mechanisms. Cases should remain open and as far as practically possible, the members and staff who dealt with the case up to the NHRI giving its recommendation should remain actively involved with the case and monitoring the implementation of the recommendation to ensure that the situation has been remedied. Continuity of staff is important to ensure that the initial problem has been addressed effectively.

6. Human rights education

Amnesty International has noted that a population which is educated in their human rights is an asset to assist NHRIs to carry out their task. Educating the population on human rights is a task that NHRIs working even under the most repressive governments are able to attempt, so it is important that it is done effectively.

General human rights education should be undertaken in a practical, illustrative way - if possible using media broadcasts to illustrate or dramatise human rights issues - rather than producing glossy, but abstract, promotional material which simply sets out general principles. It is also vital to ensure that material is disseminated to suitable target audiences.

Human rights training should be targeted at people who may have to consider and apply human rights issues in their work - law-makers, administrative decision-makers, judges, lawyers, the medical profession, teachers, social workers, prison officers and police officers, and the armed forces - and they should be encouraged to promote human rights standards among their colleagues. Again, this professional education should be undertaken in a practical way to illustrate the transformative effect of using human rights standards in daily professional life. NGOs and victims groups should be encouraged to participate in such training to ensure that a variety of viewpoints are expressed within the education process.

7. Visits to places of detention

An important role that NHRI s can fulfil is as independent professional body empowered to visit places of detention, with the aim of making recommendations to change conditions in order to prevent the incidence of torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment.

Amnesty International has received reports of a wide range of competence in fulfilling this role among NHRI s around the world. Amnesty International has received information regarding cases where an NHRI has given assurances that a certain individual although reported to have been tortured, was fine and in good health, only for the organisation’s representatives to visit the same individual shortly afterwards to find him showing signs of torture consistent with earlier reports - giving rise to the possibilities that either the NHRI had not visited, or had mis-reported their findings, or lacked the necessary expertise to carry out visits. Thorough training is essential.

On the other hand, Amnesty International has received excellent general reports by NHRI s detailing the conditions of detention, and making recommendations which have led to a decrease in the incidence of torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment. Unfortunately, recommendations are frequently not implemented by governments.

Even in cases where NHRI s undertake effective visits to places of detention, they are not provided with the human and practical resources (such as transport to all places of detention in all regions) so that they can ensure effective coverage and assessment of all places of detention.

7.1 Modalities of visits

The modalities of visits provided for in the Geneva Conventions of 1949 - Article 126 of the Third Geneva Convention, and Article 145 of the Fourth Geneva Convention - should be used by NHRI s in setting out the modalities for visits to places of detention.

These modalities are that:

1. the visiting mechanism shall have access to all places of detention, and have access to all premises in which detainees may be held.

Frequently, NHRI s are denied access to particular categories of places of detention, such as police stations, military prisons, or prisons where detainees are held under security or ‘anti-terrorist’ legislation. These are frequently the very institutions from which many reliably attested complaints of torture are received, so it is vitally important that independent monitors have access to those places to assess conditions and make recommendations for change.
ANNEXES

2. the visiting mechanism shall be able to interview detainees without witnesses, either personally or through the mechanism's own interpreter.

3. the visiting mechanism shall have liberty to select the places they wish to visit.

Frequently NHRIs are required to seek permission or give long notice of their visit. NHRIs should be able to visit 'any place,at any time' without prior authorisation in order to make a true assessment of conditions of detention.

4. the duration and frequency of visits shall not be restricted.

The only reason for denying access to a particular place of detention should be physical danger equal to the provision within the Geneva Conventions regarding compelling military necessity - which in practice means that a place of detention should only be out of bounds for visits if it is under weapon fire, and only during the period of danger. State security should not be an issue which would affect visits. The NHRI itself should assess and take appropriate precautions regarding any other risks, such as risk to health through disease prevalent within a certain institution.

8. Publicity

8.1 Media

NHRIs should ensure that they have access to the media in order to publicise their work to ensure that the population as a whole is aware of the services that the NHRI can provide; that they have human rights that can be protected and enforced; and to ensure a forum for discussion of human rights and publicity (therefore transparency) of the NHRI’s activities. It is very important that the NHRI be seen by all to be taking effective action. NHRIs should also publicise their role as an institution independent from the executive part of the government, and its policies regarding confidentiality and security.

The NHRI should use the most effective media available to make contact with as many people as possible - so, for example, in places where illiteracy is high or where newspapers are hard to obtain, radio broadcasts should be used.

8.2 Annual reports

NHRIs should ensure that their reports, particularly their annual reports, are published and circulated widely.

Amnesty International recommends that NHRIs should be empowered to publish their materials at any time. Amnesty International has received reports that some NHRIs must present their reports to parliament or other political bodies before they are empowered to publish their reports, and frequently parliamentary time is not made available for this purpose. Therefore the NHRI is effectively silenced.

Many NHRIs do not produce annual reports - it is very important that they do so in order to be accountable and transparent, and to be seen to be fulfilling its role, evaluating its results, and planning its future activities. Statistics on the numbers and types of cases received, action taken and results achieved by the NHRI in resolving the cases should be included.

8.3 Confidentiality

Although there should be an assumption in favour of transparency, particularly in reports and the findings of investigations, in such publicity, care should be taken that sensitive details which could lead to complainants, their families, witnesses and human rights defenders being put in danger, or which leads to an invasion of their privacy, should not be released. However this need for confidentiality for sensitive information should not be used as an excuse not to publish any information at all, as this could be an excuse to cover up evidence of human rights violations.

9. Accessibility
9.1 Regional offices
Local and regional offices are vitally important to the effective functioning of NHRI in a large country, or a country with isolated and inaccessible centres of population, or where transportation is difficult. Mechanisms should allow local offices a positive role in following up cases. Unfortunately Amnesty International has received reports of local offices undertaking prompt and effective investigations, but they are not empowered to follow up with local authorities: instead they have to refer cases to a central office. This can frequently become a ‘black hole’ of bureaucracy, and effectively, cases are not followed up. Where there is a network of local and central offices, effective co-ordination and communication between all should be ensured. Responsibility for following up on cases must be clearly allocated and periodic evaluations should ensure that follow-up is taking place.

9.2 Accessible premises
NHRI offices must be stationed in appropriate places - unfortunately Amnesty International has received reports of NHRI offices being located near military installations or police stations. In such cases, potential complainants may fear being noticed or monitored by the security forces if they bring their complaints. Amnesty International has received other reports of offices being intimidatingly smart or located in very up-market areas, so that the poor and other disadvantaged groups feel too uncomfortable and conspicuous to be seen going there. Other reports indicate that some offices are located in inaccessible areas where it is difficult for complainants to visit.

Within offices, there should be facilities such as private meeting rooms where complainants can discuss their complaints with NHRI staff in confidence.

9.3 Communication with victims
NHRI should take steps to ensure effective communications between itself and potential complainants.

Amnesty International has received reports of excellent initiatives to facilitate such contact - such as free-phone (toll-free) telephone lines, email and internet access, and travelling offices (one example was a specially adapted bus) or travelling field officers who can go to very isolated areas. NGO networks can also facilitate contacts with victims and witnesses.

In countries where some complainants are likely only to be able to speak minority or local languages, these should be catered for. When using interpreters, careful consideration should be given to issues of confidentiality and impartiality. Cultural sensitivities should also be taken into account, which may include the gender of the interpreter. Interviewees (including complainants and witnesses) should consent to the use of interpreters.
ANNEXES

In countries where there is widespread illiteracy, there should be common use of oral communication techniques, such as radio, and NHRI staff should take care to explain their procedures verbally, rather than relying on explanatory leaflets.

10. Budget
The government must provide the NHRI with adequate funding and resources in order to be able to fully carry out, and without restrictions and limitations, the aims and functions set out within the mandate, and particularly, to address the demands of the caseload that has been brought to its attention. The NHRI should have all necessary human and material resources to examine, thoroughly, effectively, speedily and throughout the country, the evidence and other case material concerning specific allegations of violations reported to it.

NHRI's are mandated by international standards, such as the Paris Principles, and by recommendations of civil society, such as the recommendations in this document, to cover a wide range of human rights issues, and clearly some prioritisation of activities by NHRI’s is required. Professional training and sharing of working skills so that NHRI's can maximise effective action within the bounds of resource constraints is therefore important.

Amnesty International has received reports that restrictions in NHRI budgets are used as a punitive measure to control an NHRI which is deemed to be too critical of government. AI has received reports of many examples where once set up, NHRI’s are underfunded to the extent that they cannot function effectively - leading to reasonable doubts about how serious the government was in the first place about improving the implementation human rights through the NHRI.

The mandate should specifically and explicitly include the power to be able to establish effective and alternative routes to receive funding, either from private donors or international agencies, for whatever human rights activities the NHRI is undertaking. NHRI's should develop guidelines to ensure that any such fundraising does not compromise its independence and impartiality.

Funding should be secured with a longterm perspective to enable the NHRI to plan and develop its activities with confidence about being able to fulfil them.

9.2 UN Treaty Bodies recommendations and general comments

A/RES/48/134, 85th plenary meeting, 20 December 1993

48/134. NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS FOR THE PROMOTION AND PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

The General Assembly,

Emphasising the importance of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenants on Human Rights and other international instruments for promoting respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Affirming that priority should be accorded to the development of appropriate arrangements at the national level to ensure the effective implementation of international human rights standards,

Convinced of the significant role that institutions at the national level can play in promoting and protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms and in developing and enhancing public awareness of those rights and freedoms,

Recognising that the United Nations can play a catalytic role in assisting the development of national institutions by acting as a clearing-house for the exchange of information and experience,

Mindful in this regard of the guidelines on the structure and functioning of national and local institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights endorsed by the General Assembly in its resolution 33/46 of 14 December 1978,

Welcoming the growing interest shown worldwide in the creation and strengthening of national institutions, expressed during the Regional Meeting for Africa of the World Conference on Human Rights, held at Tunis from 2 to 6 November 1992, the Regional Meeting for Latin America and the Caribbean, held at San Jose from 18 to 22 January 1993, the Regional Meeting for Asia, held at Bangkok from 29 March to 2 April 1993, the Commonwealth Workshop on National Human Rights Institutions, held at Ottawa from 30 September to 2 October 1992 and the Workshop for the Asia and Pacific Region on Human Rights Issues, held at Jakarta from 26 to 28 January 1993, and manifested in the decisions announced recently by several Member States to establish national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights,

Bearing in mind the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action, in which the World Conference on Human Rights reaffirmed the important and constructive role played by national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights, in particular in their advisory capacity to the competent authorities, their role in remedying human rights violations, in the dissemination of human rights information and in education in human rights,
Noting the diverse approaches adopted throughout the world for the promotion and protection of human rights at the national level, emphasising the universality, indivisibility and interdependence of all human rights, and emphasising and recognising the value of such approaches to promoting universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

1. Takes note with satisfaction of the updated report of the Secretary-General, prepared in accordance with General Assembly resolution 46/124 of 17 December 1991;

2. Reaffirms the importance of developing, in accordance with national legislation, effective national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights and of ensuring the pluralism of their membership and their independence;

3. Encourages Member States to establish or, where they already exist, to strengthen national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights and to incorporate those elements in national development plans;

4. Encourages national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights established by Member States to prevent and combat all violations of human rights as enumerated in the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action and relevant international instruments;

5. Requests the Centre for Human Rights of the Secretariat to continue its efforts to enhance co-operation between the United Nations and national institutions, particularly in the field of advisory services and technical assistance and of information and education, including within the framework of the World Public Information Campaign for Human Rights;

6. Also requests the Centre for Human Rights to establish, upon the request of States concerned, United Nations centres for human rights documentation and training and to do so on the basis of established procedures for the use of available resources within the United Nations Voluntary Fund for Advisory Services and Technical Assistance in the Field of Human Rights;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to respond favourably to requests from Member States for assistance in the establishment and strengthening of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights as part of the programme of advisory services and technical co-operation in the field of human rights, as well as national centres for human rights documentation and training;

8. Encourages all Member States to take appropriate steps to promote the exchange of information and experience concerning the establishment and effective operation of such national institutions;

9. Affirms the role of national institutions as agencies for the dissemination of human rights materials and for other public information activities, prepared or organised under the auspices of the United Nations;

10. Welcomes the organization under the auspices of the Centre for Human Rights of a follow-up meeting at Tunis in December 1993 with a view, in particular, to examining ways and means of promoting technical assistance for the co-operation and strengthening of national institutions and to continuing to examine all issues relating to the question of national institutions;

11. Welcomes also the Principles relating to the status of national institutions, annexed to the present resolution;

12. Encourages the establishment and strengthening of national institutions having regard to those principles and recognising that it is the right of each State to choose the framework that is best suited to its particular needs at the national level;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fiftieth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

ANNEX

Principles relating to the status of national institutions

Competence and responsibilities

1. A national institution shall be vested with competence to promote and protect human rights.

2. A national institution shall be given as broad a mandate as possible, which shall be clearly set forth in a constitutional or legislative text, specifying its composition and its sphere of competence.

3. A national institution shall, inter alia, have the following responsibilities:

   (a) To submit to the Government, Parliament and any other competent body, on an advisory basis either at the request of the authorities concerned or through the exercise of its power to hear a matter without higher referral, opinions, recommendations, proposals and reports on any matters concerning the promotion and protection of human rights; the national institution may decide to publicise them; these opinions, recommendations, proposals and reports, as well as any prerogative of the national institution, shall relate to the following areas:

      (i) Any legislative or administrative provisions, as well as provisions relating to judicial organizations, intended to preserve and extend the protection of human rights; in that connection, the national institution shall examine the legislation and administrative provisions in force, as well as bills and proposals, and shall make such recommendations as it deems appropriate in order to ensure that these provisions conform to the fundamental principles of human rights; it shall, if necessary, recommend the adoption of new legislation, the amendment of legislation in force and the adoption or amendment of administrative measures;

      (ii) Any situation of violation of human rights which it decides to take up;

      (iii) The preparation of reports on the national situation with regard to human rights in general, and on more specific matters;

      (iv) Drawing the attention of the Government to situations in any part of the country where human rights are violated and making proposals to it for initiatives to put an end to such situations and, where necessary, expressing an opinion on the positions and reactions of the Government;

   (b) To promote and ensure the harmonisation of national legislation regulations and practices with the international human rights instruments to which the State is a party, and their effective implementation;
(c) To encourage ratification of the above-mentioned instruments or accession to those instruments, and to ensure their implementation;

(d) To contribute to the reports which States are required to submit to United Nations bodies and committees, and to regional institutions, pursuant to their treaty obligations and, where necessary, to express an opinion on the subject, with due respect for their independence;

(e) To co-operate with the United Nations and any other organization in the United Nations system, the regional institutions and the national institutions of other countries that are competent in the areas of the promotion and protection of human rights;

(f) To assist in the formulation of programmes for the teaching of, and research into, human rights and to take part in their execution in schools, universities and professional circles;

(g) To publicise human rights and efforts to combat all forms of discrimination, in particular racial discrimination, by increasing public awareness, especially through information and education and by making use of all press organs.

Composition and guarantees of independence and pluralism

1. The composition of the national institution and the appointment of its members, whether by means of an election or otherwise, shall be established in accordance with a procedure which affords all necessary guarantees to ensure the pluralist representation of the social forces (of civilian society) involved in the promotion and protection of human rights, particularly by powers which will enable effective co-operation to be established with, or through the presence of, representatives of:

   (a) Non-governmental organizations responsible for human rights and efforts to combat racial discrimination, trade unions, concerned social and professional organizations, for example, associations of lawyers, doctors, journalists and eminent scientists;

   (b) Trends in philosophical or religious thought;

   (c) Universities and qualified experts;

   (d) Parliament;

   (e) Government departments (if these are included, their representatives should participate in the deliberations only in an advisory capacity).

2. The national institution shall have an infrastructure which is suited to the smooth conduct of its activities, in particular adequate funding. The purpose of this funding should be to enable it to have its own staff and premises, in order to be independent of the Government and not be subject to financial control which might affect its independence.

3. In order to ensure a stable mandate for the members of the national institution, without which there can be no real independence, their appointment shall be effected by an official act which shall establish the specific duration of the mandate. This mandate may be renewable, provided that the pluralism of the institution's membership is ensured.
Methods of operation

Within the framework of its operation, the national institution shall:

(a) Freely consider any questions falling within its competence, whether they are submitted by the Government or taken up by it without referral to a higher authority, on the proposal of its members or of any petitioner;

(b) Hear any person and obtain any information and any documents necessary for assessing situations falling within its competence;

(c) Address public opinion directly or through any press organ, particularly in order to publicise its opinions and recommendations;

(d) Meet on a regular basis and whenever necessary in the presence of all its members after they have been duly convened;

(e) Establish working groups from among its members as necessary, and set up local or regional sections to assist it in discharging its functions;

(f) Maintain consultation with the other bodies, whether jurisdictional or otherwise, responsible for the promotion and protection of human rights (in particular ombudsmen, mediators and similar institutions);

(g) In view of the fundamental role played by the non-governmental organizations in expanding the work of the national institutions, develop relations with the non-governmental organizations devoted to promoting and protecting human rights, to economic and social development, to combating racism, to protecting particularly vulnerable groups (especially children, migrant workers, refugees, physically and mentally disabled persons) or to specialised areas.

Additional principles concerning the status of commissions with quasi-jurisdictional competence

A national institution may be authorised to hear and consider complaints and petitions concerning individual situations. Cases may be brought before it by individuals, their representatives, third parties, non-governmental organizations, associations of trade unions or any other representative organizations. In such circumstances, and without prejudice to the principles stated above concerning the other powers of the commissions, the functions entrusted to them may be based on the following principles:

(a) Seeking an amicable settlement through conciliation or, within the limits prescribed by the law, through binding decisions or, where necessary, on the basis of confidentiality;

(b) Informing the party who filed the petition of his rights, in particular the remedies available to him, and promoting his access to them;

(c) Hearing any complaints or petitions or transmitting them to any other competent authority within the limits prescribed by the law;

(d) Making recommendations to the competent authorities, especially by proposing amendments or reforms of the laws, regulations and administrative practices, especially if they have created the difficulties encountered by the persons filing the petitions in order to assert their rights.
The role of national human rights institutions in the protection of economic, social and cultural rights*

1. Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Covenant obligates each State party 'to take steps ... with a view to achieving progressively the full realisation of the [Covenant] rights ... by all appropriate means'. The Committee notes that one such means, through which important steps can be taken, is the work of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights. In recent years there has been a proliferation of these institutions and the trend has been strongly encouraged by the General Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights. The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights has established a major programme to assist and encourage States in relation to national institutions.

2. These institutions range from national human rights commissions through Ombudsman offices, public interest or other human rights 'advocates', to 'defensores del pueblo'. In many cases, the institution has been established by the Government, enjoys an important degree of autonomy from the executive and the legislature, takes full account of international human rights standards which are applicable to the country concerned, and is mandated to perform various activities designed to promote and protect human rights. Such institutions have been established in States with widely differing legal cultures and regardless of their economic situation.

3. The Committee notes that national institutions have a potentially crucial role to play in promoting and ensuring the indivisibility and interdependence of all human rights. Unfortunately, this role has too often either not been accorded to the institution or has been neglected or given a low priority by it. It is therefore essential that full attention be given to economic, social and cultural rights in all of the relevant activities of these institutions. The following list is indicative of the types of activities that can be, and in some instances already have been, undertaken by national institutions in relation to these rights:

(a) The promotion of educational and information programmes designed to enhance awareness and understanding of economic, social and cultural rights, both within the population at large and among particular groups such as the public service, the judiciary, the private sector and the labour movement;

(b) The scrutinising of existing laws and administrative acts, as well as draft bills and other proposals, to ensure that they are consistent with the requirements of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights;

(c) Providing technical advice, or undertaking surveys in relation to economic, social and cultural rights, including at the request of the public authorities or other appropriate agencies;
(d) The identification of national-level benchmarks against which the realisation of Covenant obligations can be measured;

(e) Conducting research and inquiries designed to ascertain the extent to which particular economic, social and cultural rights are being realised, either within the State as a whole or in areas or in relation to communities of particular vulnerability;

(f) Monitoring compliance with specific rights recognised under the Covenant and providing reports thereon to the public authorities and civil society; and

(g) Examining complaints alleging infringements of applicable economic, social and cultural rights standards within the State.

4. The Committee calls upon States parties to ensure that the mandates accorded to all national human rights institutions include appropriate attention to economic, social and cultural rights and requests States parties to include details of both the mandates and the principal relevant activities of such institutions in their reports submitted to the Committee.

THE COMMITTEE ON THE ELIMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, Considering

the practice of States parties concerning the implementation of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination,

Convinced of the necessity to encourage further the establishment of national institutions to facilitate the implementation of the Convention,

Emphasising the need to strengthen further the implementation of the Convention,

1. Recommends that States parties establish national commissions or other appropriate bodies, taking into account, mutatis mutandis, the principles relating to the status of national institutions annexed to Commission on Human Rights resolution 1992/54 of 3 March 1992, to serve, inter alia, the following purposes:

(a) To promote respect for the enjoyment of human rights without any discrimination, as expressly set out in article 5 of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination;

(b) To review government policy towards protection against racial discrimination;

(c) To monitor legislative compliance with the provisions of the Convention;

(d) To educate the public about the obligations of States parties under the Convention;

(e) To assist the Government in the preparation of reports submitted to the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination;

2. Also recommends that, where such commissions have been established, they should be associated with the preparation of reports and possibly included in government delegations in order to intensify the dialogue between the Committee and the State party concerned.

THE ROLE OF INDEPENDENT NATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS INSTITUTIONS IN THE PROMOTION AND PROTECTION OF THE RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

1. Article 4 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child obliges States parties to ‘undertake all appropriate legislative, administrative and other measures for the implementation of the rights recognised in the present Convention’. Independent national human rights institutions (NHRIs) are an important mechanism to promote and ensure the implementation of the Convention, and the Committee on the Rights of the Child considers the establishment of such bodies to fall within the commitment made by States parties upon ratification to ensure the implementation of the Convention and advance the universal realisation of children’s rights. In this regard, the Committee has welcomed the establishment of NHRIs and children’s ombudspersons/children’s commissioners and similar independent bodies for the promotion and monitoring of the implementation of the Convention in a number of States parties.

2. The Committee issues this general comment in order to encourage States parties to establish an independent institution for the promotion and monitoring of implementation of the Convention and to support them in this regard by elaborating the essential elements of such institutions and the activities which should be carried out by them. Where such institutions have already been established, the Committee calls upon States to review their status and effectiveness for promoting and protecting children’s rights, as enshrined in the Convention on the Rights of the Child and other relevant international instruments.

3. The World Conference on Human Rights, held in 1993, in the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action reaffirmed ‘... the important and constructive role played by national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights’, and encouraged ‘... the establishment and strengthening of national institutions’. The General Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights have repeatedly called for the establishment of national human rights institutions, underlining the important role NHRIs play in promoting and protecting human rights and enhancing public awareness of those rights. In its general guidelines for periodic reports, the Committee requires that States parties furnish information on ‘any independent body established to promote and protect the rights of the child ...’, hence, it consistently addresses this issue during its dialogue with States parties.

4. NHRIs should be established in compliance with the Principles relating to the status of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights (The ‘Paris Principles’) adopted by the General Assembly in 1993 transmitted by the Commission on Human Rights in 1992. These minimum standards provide guidance for the establishment, competence, responsibilities, composition, including pluralism, independence, methods of operation, and quasi-judicial activities of such national bodies.

5. While adults and children alike need independent NHRIs to protect their human rights, additional justifications exist for ensuring that children’s human rights are given special attention. These include the facts that children’s developmental state makes them particularly vulnerable to human rights violations; their opinions are still rarely taken into account; most children have no vote and cannot play a meaningful role in the political process that determines Governments’ response to human rights; children encounter significant problems in using the judicial system to protect their rights or to seek remedies for violations of their rights; and children’s access to organisations that may protect their rights is generally limited.

6. Specialist independent human rights institutions for children, ombudspersons or commissioners for children’s rights have been established in a growing number of States parties. Where resources are limited, consideration must be given to ensuring that the available resources are used most effectively for the promotion and protection of everyone’s human rights, including children’s, and in this context development of a broad-based NHRI that includes a specific focus on children is likely to constitute the best approach. A broad-based NHRI should include within its structure either an identifiable commissioner specifically responsible for children’s rights, or a specific section or division responsible for children’s rights.

7. It is the view of the Committee that every State needs an independent human rights institution with responsibility for promoting and protecting children’s rights. The Committee’s principal concern is that the institution, whatever its form, should be able, independently and effectively, to monitor, promote and protect children’s rights. It is essential that promotion and protection of children’s rights is ‘mainstreamed’ and that all human rights institutions existing in a country work closely together to this end.

MANDATE AND POWERS

8. NHRIs should, if possible, be constitutionally entrenched and must at least be legislatively mandated. It is the view of the Committee that their mandate should include as broad a scope as possible for promoting and protecting human rights, incorporating the Convention on the Rights of the Child, its Optional Protocols and other relevant international human rights instruments - thus effectively covering children’s human rights, in particular their civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights. The legislation should include provisions setting out specific functions, powers and duties relating to children linked to the Convention on the Rights of the Child and its Optional Protocols. If the NHRI was established before the existence of the Convention, or without expressly incorporating it, necessary arrangements, including the enactment or amendment of legislation, should be put in place so as to ensure conformity of the institution’s mandate with the principles and provisions of the Convention.

9. NHRIs should be accorded such powers as are necessary to enable them to discharge their mandate effectively, including the power to hear any person and obtain any information and document necessary for assessing the situations falling within their competence. These powers should include the promotion and protection of the rights of all children under the jurisdiction of the State party in relation not only to the State but to all relevant public and private entities.

ESTABLISHMENT PROCESS

10. The NHRI establishment process should be consultative, inclusive and transparent, initiated and supported at the highest levels of Government and inclusive of all relevant elements of the State, the legislature and civil society. In order to ensure their independence and effective functioning, NHRIs must have adequate infrastructure, funding (including specifically for children’s rights, within broad-based institutions), staff, premises, and freedom from forms of financial control that might affect their independence.

RESOURCES

11. While the Committee acknowledges that this is a very sensitive issue and that State parties function with varying levels of economic resources, the Committee believes that it is the duty of States to make reasonable financial provision for the operation of national human rights institutions in light of article 4 of the Convention. The mandate and powers of national institutions may be meaningless, or the exercise of their powers limited, if the national institution does not have the means to operate effectively to discharge its powers.

PLURALISTIC REPRESENTATION

12. NHRIs should ensure that their composition includes pluralistic representation of the various elements of civil society involved in the promotion and protection of human rights. They should seek to involve, among others, the following: human rights, anti-discrimination and children’s rights non-governmental organisations (NGOs), including child- and youth-led organisations; trade unions; social and professional organisations (of doctors, lawyers, journalists, scientists, etc.); universities and experts, including children’s rights experts. Government departments should be involved in an advisory capacity only. NHRIs should have appropriate and transparent appointment procedures, including an open and competitive selection process.

PROVIDING REMEDIES FOR BREACHES OF CHILDREN’S RIGHTS

13. NHRIs must have the power to consider individual complaints and petitions and carry out investigations, including those submitted on behalf of or directly by children. In order to be able to effectively carry out such investigations, they must have the powers to compel and question witnesses, access relevant documentary evidence and access places of detention. They also have a duty to seek to ensure that children have effective remedies - independent advice, advocacy and complaints procedures - for any breaches of their rights. Where appropriate, NHRIs should undertake mediation and conciliation of complaints.

14. NHRIs should have the power to support children taking cases to court, including the power (a) to take cases concerning children’s issues in the name of the NHRI and (b) to intervene in court cases to inform the court about the human rights issues involved in the case.

ACCESSIBILITY AND PARTICIPATION

15. NHRIs should be geographically and physically accessible to all children. In the spirit of article 2 of the Convention, they should proactively reach out to all groups of children, in particular the most vulnerable and disadvantaged, such as (but not limited to) children in care or detention, children from minority and indigenous groups, children with disabilities, children living in poverty, refugee and migrant children, street children and children with special needs in areas such as culture, language, health and education. NHRI legislation should include the right of the institution to have access in conditions of privacy to children in all forms of alternative care and to all institutions that include children.
16. NHRIs have a key role to play in promoting respect for the views of children in all matters affecting them, as articulated in article 12 of the Convention, by Government and throughout society. This general principle should be applied to the establishment, organisation and activities of national human rights institutions. Institutions must ensure that they have direct contact with children and that children are appropriately involved and consulted. Children’s councils, for example, could be created as advisory bodies for NHRIs to facilitate the participation of children in matters of concern to them.

17. NHRIs should devise specially tailored consultation programmes and imaginative communication strategies to ensure full compliance with article 12 of the Convention. A range of suitable ways in which children can communicate with the institution should be established.

18. NHRIs must have the right to report directly, independently and separately on the state of children’s rights to the public and to parliamentary bodies. In this respect, States parties must ensure that an annual debate is held in Parliament to provide parliamentarians with an opportunity to discuss the work of the NHRI in respect of children’s rights and the State’s compliance with the Convention.

RECOMMENDED ACTIVITIES

19. The following is an indicative, but not exhaustive, list of the types of activities which NHRIs should carry out in relation to the implementation of children’s rights in light of the general principles of the Convention. They should:

(a) Undertake investigations into any situation of violation of children’s rights, on complaint or on their own initiative, within the scope of their mandate;

(b) Conduct inquiries on matters relating to children’s rights;

(c) Prepare and publicise opinions, recommendations and reports, either at the request of national authorities or on their own initiative, on any matter relating to the promotion and protection of children’s rights;

(d) Keep under review the adequacy and effectiveness of law and practice relating to the protection of children’s rights;

(e) Promote harmonisation of national legislation, regulations and practices with the Convention on the Rights of the Child, its Optional Protocols and other international human rights instruments relevant to children’s rights and promote their effective implementation, including through the provision of advice to public and private bodies in construing and applying the Convention;

(f) Ensure that national economic policy makers take children’s rights into account in setting and evaluating national economic and development plans;

(g) Review and report on the Government’s implementation and monitoring of the state of children’s rights, seeking to ensure that statistics are appropriately disaggregated and other information collected on a regular basis in order to determine what must be done to realise children’s rights;

(h) Encourage ratification of or accession to any relevant international human rights instruments;
(i) In accordance with article 3 of the Convention requiring that the best interests of children should be a primary consideration in all actions concerning them, ensure that the impact of laws and policies on children is carefully considered from development to implementation and beyond;

(j) In light of article 12, ensure that the views of children are expressed and heard on matters concerning their human rights and in defining issues relating to their rights;

(k) Advocate for and facilitate meaningful participation by children's rights NGOs, including organisations comprised of children themselves, in the development of domestic legislation and international instruments on issues affecting children;

(l) Promote public understanding and awareness of the importance of children's rights and, for this purpose, work closely with the media and undertake or sponsor research and educational activities in the field;

(m) In accordance with article 42 of the Convention which obligates State parties to 'make the principles and provisions of the Convention widely known, by appropriate and active means, to adults and children alike', sensitise the Government, public agencies and the general public to the provisions of the Convention and monitor ways in which the State is meeting its obligations in this regard;

(n) Assist in the formulation of programmes for the teaching of, research into and integration of children's rights in the curricula of schools and universities and in professional circles;

(o) Undertake human rights education which specifically focuses on children (in addition to promoting general public understanding about the importance of children's rights);

(p) Take legal proceedings to vindicate children's rights in the State or provide legal assistance to children;

(q) Engage in mediation or conciliation processes before taking cases to court, where appropriate;

(r) Provide expertise in children's rights to the courts, in suitable cases as amicus curiae or intervenor;

(s) In accordance with article 3 of the Convention which obliges States parties to 'ensure that the institutions, services and facilities responsible for the care or protection of children shall conform with the standards established by competent authorities, particularly in the areas of safety, health, in the number and suitability of their staff, as well as competent supervision', undertake visits to juvenile homes (and all places where children are detained for reform or punishment) and care institutions to report on the situation and to make recommendations for improvement;

(t) Undertake such other activities as are incidental to the above.
COMPARATIVE STUDY ON MANDATES OF NHRIs IN THE COMMONWEALTH

REPORTING TO THE COMMITTEE ON THE RIGHTS OF THE CHILD AND CO-OPERATION BETWEEN NHRIs AND UNITED NATIONS AGENCIES AND HUMAN RIGHTS MECHANISMS

20. NHRIs should contribute independently to the reporting process under the Convention and other relevant international instruments and monitor the integrity of government reports to international treaty bodies with respect to children's rights, including through dialogue with the Committee on the Rights of the Child at its pre-sessional working group and with other relevant treaty bodies.

21. The Committee requests that States parties include detailed information on the legislative basis and mandate and principal relevant activities of NHRIs in their reports to the Committee. It is appropriate for States parties to consult with independent human rights institutions during the preparation of reports to the Committee. However, States parties must respect the independence of these bodies and their independent role in providing information to the Committee. It is not appropriate to delegate to NHRIs the drafting of reports or to include them in the government delegation when reports are examined by the Committee.

22. NHRIs should also co-operate with the special procedures of the Commission on Human Rights, including country and thematic mechanisms, in particular the Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict.

23. The United Nations has a long-standing programme of assistance for the establishment and strengthening of national human rights institutions. This programme, which is based in the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), provides technical assistance and facilitates regional and global co-operation and exchanges among national human rights institutions. States parties should avail themselves of this assistance where necessary. The United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF) also offers expertise and technical co-operation in this area.

24. As articulated in article 45 of the Convention, the Committee may also transmit, as it considers appropriate, to any specialised United Nations agency, OHCHR and any other competent body any reports from States parties that contain a request or indicate a need for technical advice or assistance in the establishment of NHRIs.

NHRIS AND STATES PARTIES

25. The State ratifies the Convention on the Rights of the Child and takes on obligations to implement it fully. The role of NHRIs is to monitor independently the State’s compliance and progress towards implementation and to do all it can to ensure full respect for children’s rights. While this may require the institution to develop projects to enhance the promotion and protection of children’s rights, it should not lead to the Government delegating its monitoring obligations to the national institution. It is essential that institutions remain entirely free to set their own agenda and determine their own activities.

NHRIS AND NGOs

26. Non-governmental organisations play a vital role in promoting human rights and children’s rights. The role of NHRIs, with their legislative base and specific powers, is complementary. It is essential that institutions work closely with NGOs and that Governments respect the independence of both NHRIs and NGOs.
ANNEXES

REGIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

27. Regional and international processes and mechanisms can strengthen and consolidate NHRIs through shared experience and skills, as NHRIs share common problems in the promotion and protection of human rights in their respective countries.

28. In this respect, NHRIs should consult and co-operate with relevant national, regional and international bodies and institutions on children’s rights issues.

29. Children’s human rights issues are not constrained by national borders and it has become increasingly necessary to devise appropriate regional and international responses to a variety of child rights issues (including, but not limited to, the trafficking of women and children, child pornography, child soldiers, child labour, child abuse, refugee and migrant children, etc.). International and regional mechanisms and exchanges are encouraged, as they provide NHRIs with an opportunity to learn from each other’s experience, collectively strengthen each other’s positions and contribute to resolving human rights problems affecting both countries and regions.
